PREFACE

In preparing this edition of the Menaechmi I have derived much assistance from Brix's fifth edition, revised by Niemeyer, and have found Hildyard's edition, though antiquated, not without value. Among other authorities consulted I may mention Lindsay's Latin Language and Syntax of Plautus; contributions to the Journal of Philology and other periodicals by Lindsay, Onions, and Sonnenschein ; Havet's Observations sur Plaute in the Revue de Philologie (1908) ; Sonnenschein's Rudens; Lindsay's Captivi ; and Gray's Asinaria.

My best thanks for valuable corrections and suggestions are due to Mr. H. W. Garrod, who read this work in manuscript ; to Mr. C. E. Freeman, who read it in proof; and to the Reader to the Clarendon Press. The text and apparatus criticus are by permission taken from the edition of Professor Lindsay in the Scriptorum Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis.

It is hoped that the Index to the Notes may prove of some slight value to scholars.

INTRODUCTION

r. The Play

The plot of the Menaechmi turns upon the extraordinary resemblance of twin brothers bearing the same name, who have been separated in infancy, and of whom one, prosecuting a search for his brother in manhood, accidentally arrives at the town where the other dwells. Such a situation naturally gives rise to an abundance of comic errors and laughable incidents; and as their power to amuse largely depends upon their unexpectedness, it is not proposed to anticipate the reading of the play by giving here any detailed outline of it. The remarks which follow in this section are therefore intended to supplement the study of the actual text.

First, then, as regards the play generally, the plot is thin and improbable, merely affording a background for ludicrous situations and for a highly diverting game of cross-purposes. Apart from the unlikelihood of a resemblance, even between twin brothers, so close as to deceive the most familiar intimates, Menaechmus of Syracuse, seeing that he was actually searching for his brother when he found himself accosted by strangers as Menaechmus and obviously mistaken for some one else, would surely in real life have correctly guessed the identity of his unknown double-more especially as he knew that his brother was the original owner of the name (cf. II. ii and iii, esp. 40613, with 1122-8). Again, it is surprising that the wife's suspicions are not aroused by the answers she receives from her supposed husband, the real Menaechmus being normally such a timid henpecked creature (see V. i, esp. 710-11). Lastly, the recognition scene is lengthened out far beyond the bounds of probability.

On the other hand these improbabilities are postulated by the incidents which form the staple of the play; and, granted those improbabilities, they follow necessarily. The weakness of the plot, therefore, detracts but little from the merit of the play, the excellence of which lies first in its atmosphere of high spirits, comic roguery, and perplexed bewilderment, and secondly in its skilful if not subtle characterization. The horseplay of I. ii, the supposed madman's antics in V. ii, and the scuffle with the lorarii in V. vii, would doubtless tickle the schoolboy-like fancy of the average Roman spectator; scenes like the baiting of Menaechmus of Epidamnus by his wife and the parasite (IV. ii), or the doctor's cross-examination of his patient (V.v), have a slightly more intellectual appeal ; and such episodes as the Syracusan's cunning evasion of the results of his own mistakes (418-21, 531-7), or his brother's assumption of injured innocence, culminating in his childlike and bland Quis is Menaechmust? (651), are irresistibly humorous.

Of the characters in the play, the two Menaechmi are merely a pair of self-indulgent rogues; if any distinction is to be drawn between them, perhaps Menaechmus of Syracuse is the robuster villain. This difference seems to have been noted and developed in the Comedy of Errors by Shakespeare, whose Antipholus of Syracuse offers a strong contrast to the solemn and cantankerous Antipholus of Ephesus. Shakespeare has also drawn upon the characteristics of Messenio for his portrait of the younger Dromio twin. Just as the latter is a foil for his master, so Messenio, in comparison with Menaechmus of Syracuse, is a model of propriety (cf. 258 seq., $338-45$ ) and of self-satisfied respectability (cf. V. vi). The last scene of the play would be tedious but for the pompous fussiness with which Messenio conducts the investigation. Of the remaining characters, the Physician is perhaps the most skilfully drawn, and the scenes in which he appears are among the most amusing (see V. iii-v). He represents a type not yet extinct. The scolding wife, the parasite, the courtesan, and the greybeard are drawn on obvious lines. Peniculus's soliloquy on the moral value of good feeding (I. i), and the courtesan's philosophy (353-6), her blarney (I. iii, II. iii), and spite under disappointment (IV. iii), are in accordance with convention, yet show a certain novelty of treatment. More subtle touches are the Parasite's anxiety to prevent over-extravagance on his patron's part (204-6), and the delicate hint of the courtesan's maid (543). Finally, the play is rich in the more hackneyed devices of the comic stage-in puns, dramatic 'irony', and swift repartee. Though the Menaechmi is not ranked highest of Plautus's productions, the opinion of most critics gives it a place among the first five or six ; and perhaps the young and unspoiled will derive more entertainment from it than from more subtle plays such as the Captivi or the Trinummus.

2. Life and Works of Plautus

T. Maccius Plautus was born about 254 B.c. at Sarsina in Umbria. Thus, like the majority of great Roman writers, he was of provincial origin. Little is known about his life ; such information as we possess is mainly derived from traditions collected by Aulus Gellius. He is said to have migrated to the capital early in life, and there to have found work first as a stage-carpenter, an employment which enabled him to save a little money, and doubtless turned his attention towards his true métier. His small nest-egg, however, vanished as the result of a rash investment, and he was reduced to such straits as to seek employment with a miller as a common labourer. His duty consisted in working a treadmill, and it has been conjectured that hence he derived that deformity of the feet which, according to Festus, won him the nickname of Plautus (Flatfoot). As the word, however, is Umbrian, it was more probably a patronymic derived from an ancestor who suffered from this malformation (cf. the surnames Varus, Scaurus, &c.). During the brief intervals of leisure he enjoyed from this uncongenial work, he began to arrange plays for the comic stage. It is probable that as soon as moderate success seemed to be assured, he left the mill for the greenroom and became, like Sbakespeare, at once an actor and an adapter or composer of plays. His dramatic career extended from about 224 B.C. till his death in 184 в.c.

A very large number of plays was originally ascribed to him, ${ }^{1}$ but it is probable that the majority of these were in no sense Plautine, while many of the rest were merely adaptations of existing plays, both Latin and rough translations from Greek, carried out by Plautus as an experienced actor-manager. The case of Shakespeare again presents a parallel. At the same time several plays were early recognized as owing their Latin dress to Plautus alone, and Varro fixed the canon by enumerating twenty-one as indisputably of Plautine authorship (i.e. as adapted by Plautus from the Greek at first hand). These include the twenty still extant, together with the Vidularia, of which fragments remain in the Ambrosian palimpsest.

The plays of Plautus and Terence were fabulae palliatae, i. e. plays adapted from Greek originals, in which both the setting and the dresses were Greek (pallium $=i \mu \dot{\alpha} \tau t o v) .{ }^{2} \quad$ The Greek dramatists whose plots they borrowed were those representing the 'New' Comedy, which portrayed the contemporary social life of Athens, and which consisted mainly of variations on the same theme, with the same set of characters-fathers and sons, wives, parasites, slaves, courtesans, and panders. The prohibition of politics and personalities on the Roman stage made it impossible to adapt plays of the 'Old' or Aristophanic

[^0]Comedy or even of the transitional or 'Middle' Comedy. Thus most of Terence's plays are reproductions of Menander, the leading dramatist of the New Comedy ; of Plautus's plays, three (Bacch., Cist., Poen.) are based upon plays of Menander, four (Cas., Merc., Most., Trin.) are drawn from Philemon, and the Rudens and Asinaria from lesser-known dramatists of the same school.

While, however, Terence's plays are faithful translations of his models and reproduce the delicacy and subtlety of the Attic spirit, Plautus's productions bear the unmistakable impress of the adapter's hand. Not only does he sprinkle his plays with allusions to Roman history, customs, and institutions, and with Latin puns, jokes, and turns of speech, but the more boisterous humour which is their distinguishing feature is peculiarly his own. Employed about the stage in early life, he had had opportunities of gauging the taste of the Roman populace, and knew what broad comic effects were needed to keep a Roman audience from strolling off to a rope-walking display or a dogfight ; cf. Ter. Hec. prol. 4, 33-42. His importance for us, indeed, lies in the fact that, reflecting as he did a Roman audience's well-fed jollity, coarseness, and appreciation of the obvious, he was the most truly Roman of the Roman dramatists. Terence had a more limited number of admirers-chiefly the rich and cultivated Scipionic circle. In spite of this Plautus enjoyed but moderate success during his lifetime; Terence, on the other hand, was the petted favourite of the few. In the Rome of those days, as in our own country down to the time of Pope, it was more profitable to court the patronage of the great than to win the favour of the mutable rank-scented many.

But that Plautus's work gained general, if posthumous, appreciation is evident from the numerous revivals of his plays during the period $\mathrm{I} 50-50$ B.c. The harsh criticisms of Horace ${ }^{1}$ seem to reflect the estimate of a rather 'precious'

[^1]circle of superior persons-cf. Pollio's depreciation of Livy, Cicero both praises Plautus directly, and flatters him indirectly by the numerous reminiscences of Plautine phrase and usage which find place in his Letters; and it may be conjectured that Caesar recognized in the more popular playwright that comica uis of which he deplores the lack in Terence. The average Roman's sentiments were probably voiced by the epitaph which Varro quotes:

> Postquam est mortem aptus Plautus, Comoedia luget, Scaena est deserta, dein Risus, Ludus, Iocusque, Et Numeri innumeri simul omnes conlacrimarunt.

3. Date of Play and Authorship of Original

It is impossible to arrive at any certain conclusion with regard to the date at which the Menaechmi was first produced. The only passage on which even a doubtful theory can be based is Il. 408-12 Syracusis . . .ubi . . . regnator . . . nunc Hiero est. If this passage is an original addition, it was probably inserted by Plautus as a compliment to Hiero II, whose valuable assistance in 216 b.c., during Hannibal's invasion, made him a persona grata to the Romans, and who died in 215 or $214 \mathrm{~B} . \mathrm{C}$. On this hypothesis, then, the play must have been produced between 216 and 214 B.C., and is one of Plautus's earliest efforts. On the other hand, the excellence of the play seems to postulate long practice and experience on the part of the playwright, and it is unlikely that the Romans had much stomach for light farce during the early years of the Second Punic War. We are left then with the probability that Plautus took the passage as it stands from his original, which must have been either (i) a drama of the New Comedy produced between 270 and 215 B. C. (the period of Hiero II's reign), or (ii) a play of Epicharmus; in this case the reference in 1.412 would be to Hiero I, tyrant of Syracuse in the fifth century b.c. ; but the mention in l. 4ro of Agathocles, Hiero II's immediate predecessor, seems to be conclusive against this, and other objections may be urged against the view that Epicharmus provided the model (see below). It may be said in conclusion that the passage $40 \Omega-12$ is not sufficiently serious to base a theory upon (see 409-12, note), and that internal evidence seems to point to a date at which the poet's powers were fully developed.

From what Greek original Plautus derived the outline of the Menaechmi is not known. A now exploded theory ascribed his model to Epicharmus, the founder of Greek comedy proper, who lived at the court of Hiero I of Syracuse, a patron of literature, during the fifth century B.c. This view was founded on the statement made in ll. II-I2 of the Prologue, hoc argumentum . . . sicilicissitat, and seemed to derive further support from Horace's remark in Epp. ii. i. 58 (dicitur) Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi. But in the latter passage the point of comparison lies merely in the ease and rapidity with which either author developed his plot; and the words quoted from the Prologue mean nothing more than that the story has a Sicilian background or concerns Sicilian folk. Lastly, although Epicharmus, in spite of his early date, had more in common with the New Comedy than with Aristophanes, such fragments of his plays-mostly burlesques of mythological legends-as we possess afford no support to this theory, nor is there any certain instance of a Latin play based on any work of his.

A more probable, though equally hypothetical view attributes the original to Poseidippus, a dramatist of the New Comedy. This theory is based upon a remark made by a character in Athenaeus (Deipn. xiv. 658-9), oủk åv єṽ́po九 $\tau \iota s$ סoû $\lambda o v \mu a ́ \gamma \epsilon \iota \rho o ́ v$
ordinary domestic slave (cf. 218 note), while the cooks in the Aulularia, hired from the forum (Aul. 280-1), are evidently slaves kept for hiring out, their fees going to their owner (cf. Aul. 309-10, where Anthrax asks whether Euclio could be induced to purchase his and his fellow-cook's freedom) ; it has therefore been conjectured that the Menaechmi and the Aulularia were derived from plays of Poseidippus. But seeing that Anthrax and Congrio are slaves, we may safely infer, what on general grounds we should naturally suspect, namely, that such hired cooks were almost invariably slaves (cf. the status of physicians, and see 95 I note) ; and in the case of the Casina and the Mercator, where such cooks appear, the author of the originals is known to have been not Poseidippus but Philemon. Finally and conclusively, the statement in Athenaeus (which after all may not be intended seriously) is directly disproved by the appearance of a domestic slave-cook Syriscus in the newlydiscovered Epitrepontes of Menander; in fragments, too, of other New Comedy dramatists cooks bear names, such as Syrus, Cario, \&c., of the type given only to slaves (cf. note on Messenio under heading Personae). On other grounds, however, it is not unreasonable to suppose that Poseidippus, who wrote a play entitled ${ }^{\circ} \mathrm{O} \mu o \iota o$, and who was alive during Hiero II's reign, may have furnished the model from which Plautus derived the Menaechmi.

The amusing errors arising from confusion of twins exactly resembling each other were evidently a favourite plot-basis with dramatists of the Middle and New Comedy; plays with the title of $\Delta i \delta \delta \nu \mu o t$ are ascribed by ancient authorities to six Greek comic dramatists, a $\Delta i \hat{\delta} v \mu a \iota$ to Menander, and an A $\dot{u} \lambda \eta \tau \rho i \stackrel{s}{\eta} \hat{\eta} \Delta i \delta v \mu a \iota$ to Antiphanes. Of the six authors of $\Delta i \delta v \mu o l$, however, only one, namely, Euphron, was a New Comedy writer and flourished during Hiero II's reign. The central idea of this play and its predecessors is one rich in possibilities of comic incident ; it is therefore not surprising to find it a favourite plot-basis of comic dramatists of many ages and countries (see § 5 below). Plautus himself bases the plot of the Amphitruo on a supernatural double resemblance ; and P'ilocomasium's 'dream' in the Miles Gloriosus is a development of the same idea.

It has already been stated that Plautus adapted his models with a very free hand, introducing Roman features without much regard to consistency. The constant references to the infliction of cruel punishments on slaves are entirely at variance with the relations existing between Athenian masters and their slaves. Slave-punishments were a conventional joke, as it were, of the Roman comic stage, like mothers-in-law and drunkenness in our own music-halls. Mommsen remarks on this point: 'In the endless abundance of cudgelling and in the lash ever suspended over the back of the slaves we recognize very clearly the household-government inculcated by Cato, just as we recognize the Catonian opposition to women in the neverending disparagement of wives'. The abuse levelled at physicians (see nute on $885^{-6}$ ) and parasites is likewise probably due to Catonian influence. Plautus further constantly introduces allusions to Roman religion, to Roman customs, institutions and offices, and to Roman topography; the result is 'a patchwork of Roman local tints distributed over the Greek ground '.

The Menaechmi furnishes many illustrations of Plautus's method of treatment. To the Roman attitude towards slaves we have references in 79-93, 249-51, 943 (caesum . . . sub furca), 951 (pendentem fodiam), V. vi ; self-assertive wives are depreciated in I. ii, $766-71$, and elsewhere. Roman religion appears in the mention of the Cerealia ror, and of the proverbial stealing of Jove's crown 941 ; there are allusions to Roman legal and social institutions in $96-7$ (enslavement for debt); 451-9 (contiones) ; 571-95 (clientes, and Roman legal procedure) ; 1028-33 and 1148-50 (manumission): notice also the metaphor from the legion and adscriptiui 183-8. Roman social customs are mentioned in 437, 445, &c. (aduorsitor), II 53 (auction), 160 (circus-games), 210-II (Roman fondness for pork). Other features for which Plautus is responsible are puns such as those on geminus and gemere 257, on Epidamnus 263-7, on uerba and uerbera 978, on mŏlitum and mölitum 979, palla pallorem incutit 610; and comic Latin nicknames, such as Peniculus (cf. 77-8, 286, 391).

At the same time Plautus's title to originality does not rest merely upon such features and allusions as have been specified. To Terence, who however excellent a translator was little more, he offers a distinct contrast ; and in dramatic instinct, spontaneity of humour, and power of characterization he may be regarded as the prototype of his far greater successor, our own-in spite of German claims-still British Shakespeare, whose plays, like those of Plautus, were original in all but plot.

4. The Staging of the Play

In Plautus's day the theatrical profession existed only on sufferance. No permanent theatre was built until $55 \mathrm{~B} . \mathrm{C}$., before which date dramatic representations took place on temporary stages of wood before audiences that had to bring their own chairs. While the general plan of the Roman theatre, temporary or permanent, followed Greek models, the space occupied in the Greek theatre by the $\dot{\rho} \rho \chi \dot{\eta} \sigma \tau \rho a$ (which formed a segment of a circle greater than a semicircle, and in which the chorus danced and sang) was in the Roman theatre reduced to an exact semicircle of which the front of the stage formed the diameter ; and, in the absence of a chorus, this space was reserved (by law after 194 B.C.) for the senators, thus roughly corresponding to the stalls of a modern theatre. Round the edge of this semicircle, in the later permanent theatres, rose tiers of seats with gangways running down at intervals; in earlier times ground forming a natural amphitheatre was chosen for the site of a temporary theatre, and the spectators stood, or sat on their own camp-stools, in the space outside the orchestra.

The actual stage (proscaenium, pulpitum) was extraordinarily long-some authorities say, 180 feet. Hence verisimilitude was given to 'asides', or to the failure of a hidden character to overhear soliloquies or conversations (cf. 478-9, 966 note), and an actor could deliver a speech of considerable length while passing from one end of the stage to the other (cf. 753 note). The scenery was primitive and conventional. The background usually represented two houses, with sometimes a passage (angiportum), which might serve as a hiding-place, running between them. The doors of these houses opened on to the stage, and served as extra stage-exits. The stage itself thus represented a street, and in the absence of any device, such as the Greek $\mathfrak{\epsilon} \kappa к и ́ к \lambda \eta \mu a$, whereby the interior of a room could be shown, every incident in a play had to be presented as taking place in the street, though sometimes a character spoke into a house from the doorstep (cf. IIo, $35 \mathrm{r}, 466$ ). The same background served for a succession of different plays and a variety of different scenes (cf. Prologue 72-6). The main exits from the stage were by the wings, and by convention the left-hand exit (to the spectators' right) was supposed to lead to and from the forum and town proper, that on the right hand to and from the harbour. Characters arriving from foreign parts thus entered R. ${ }^{1}$ (See also notes on ll. 226, 555, 562, $567,700,88 \mathrm{r}, 966$, r049.) Subjoined is a plan showing the probable arrangement of the stage for a performance of the Menaechmi:-

[^2]Such conventions helped the audience to follow the play, and partly did away with the necessity for a programme. Even the matter-of-fact Roman had sufficient imagination to be able to dispense with detailed explanations and elaborately realistic scenery and effects, aids without which the faculties of a modern audience would remain dormant and uncomprehending. The student is advised to re-read those prologues-among the most sonorous and noble poems in the English language-wherein Shakespeare apologizes for the deficiencies of the 'unworthy scaffold' on which, within the 'wooden $O$ ' of the Globe Theatre, the great national drama of Henry $V$ was first played. In Plautus's day, as in Shakespeare's, the spectators were called upon to contribute their share of work, and to 'piece out the imperfections' of representation by exercise of the imagination. Shades of the commercial prison-house had not yet begun to obscure the traces of that love of make-believe, still conspicuous in bright and natural children, in which the thinker finds the psychological raison d'être of the drama. The play was the thing, not the scenery, nor the dresses-nor even the acting.

A Roman audience, however, was not required-nor had it the power-to exercise fancy in the same degree as an Elizabethan audience. The plots of Roman comedies had, for the most part, a family resemblance to one another, and mainly the same characters, with mere changes of name, did duty for each play. These stock characters could always be distinguished and identified by their dress and equipment. Young men like the Menaechmi wore black wigs and red pallia. Travellers arriving from abroad were decked in chlamys (ulster), petasus (wideawake), and sword. In this play, however, Menaechmus of Syracuse evidently leaves these articles at the harbour, and appears on the stage garbed and bewigged precisely as his brother (cf. 226 note). A parasite like Peniculus was known by his long grey or black pallium, and sometimes carried an oil-flask and strigil. Slaves were distinguished by red wigs; old men by white wigs (cf. 854), long white beards (cf. 838 hircus, 854), and walking-sticks (cf. 856). Respectable women wore pallae of plain material, white or dark-blue or green according to age, while courtesans were dressed in smart red or yellow tunics and white or yellow pallae with plenty of trimming (cf. 427 note), and in some cases wore still more elaborate attire, or appeared in an elegant déshabillé (cf. Most. 248 seq.). Wigs and paint alone served for facial disguise, masks not being used on the Roman public stage until after the time of Terence (cf. 609 note).

The division of plays by Plautus and Terence into Acts dates from the Renaissance. The Roman dramatist had perforce to observe the 'Unity of Time', and was careful to avoid pauses in the action; theatre-bars had not yet been thought of, and if any long wait had occurred, the actors would have been faced by empty benches on their reappearance. Where a short pause is unavoidable, as at Pseud. 573, an apology is made, and the interval filled with a selection of music. At the same time, owing to the exigencies of the plot, occasions would arise when the stage was momentarily empty ; and in the Menaechmi at least the Renaissance editor has happily fixed the divisions between the Acts at the only four points where this occurs. Division into Scenes was of earlier date, and is a feature of all MSS. of Plautus and Terence ; but here again the divisions do not correspond to any actual break, the exit of a character or entrance of a new speaker being sufficient to mark a change of Scene, which did not therefore involve change of scenery. Accordingly in some MSS. each 'Scene' bears as a heading the names of the characters taking part in it. It may be noted that in this play, instead of the existing breaks between Scenes at 875 and 888 , there should be but a single break, namely, at 88 r .

On the other hand, Roman comedies fall into certain natural divisions, corresponding mainly to the various methods of delivery ; namely, prologus, diuerbia, and cantica. The Prologue, which was spoken, served partly to explain the plot and partly to enable the poet, through the medium of the actor, to address the audience directly and to defend himself against criticism. The Plautine prologues, few of which are original (see note under heading Prologus, p. ir9), are mostly of the former variety (but cf. Men. prol. 7-12); Terence's prologues serve both purposes. The Prologue thus fulfilled the function partly of a modern programme and partly of the Parabasis of Old Greek Comedy. Diuerbia included all passages written continuously in iambic metres; these marked the less exciting parts of the play, and were, like the Prologue, merely spoken, though necessarily in a loud tone. As on the one hand the earlier temporary theatres were uncovered, while the later permanent theatres were built without regard to the laws of acoustics, and as on the other hand the Romans did not until the time of the actor Roscius adopt the Greek fashion of wearing masks constructed on acoustic principles, the delivery of diuerbia was naturally fatiguing; and it was chiefly owing to the strain thus entailed that cantica were interposed. Cantica proper were the lyrical monologues written in various metres (e. g. ІІо-34, 351-68, 57I-603, 753-74, 966-89), which were sung to an air on the tibia and were accompanied by rude dancing or comic gait (see notes on 753, 754). Cantica in a wider sense included the more rapid and exciting scenes marked by the use of trochaic septenarii ; these corresponded to the recitative of a modern opera and were intoned to the accompaniment of a musical obbligato.

The functions of the Greek chorus were discharged partly by the cantica proper, which usually contained moral or social reflections-e.g. 353-6 (courtesans' philosophy), 571-95 (clientes and their drawbacks), 753-60 (evils of old age), 766-7I (masterful wives), 966-85 (the Whole Duty of Slaves)-, partly by $\gamma^{\nu} \hat{\omega} \mu \mathrm{a}$ or sententious maxims scattered through the play (e. g. 87-8, 193, 249) ; and, in respect of the Parabasis, as has been mentioned, by the Prologue.

The strict dramatic rule nec quarta loqui persona laboret (Hor. A. P. 192) was disregarded on the comic stage; thus for the Menaechmi at least five actors (apart from кшф̀̀ $\pi \rho o ́ \sigma \omega \pi a$ such as the lorarii and nauales pedes) were required, among whom Brix apportions the parts as follows: (1) Menaechmus I; (2) Menaechmus II, Medicus; (3) Peniculus, Messenio; (4) Cylindrus, Ancilla, Matrona; (5) Erotium, Senex.

5. Modern Derivatives

That comic dramatists were, from an early date in the history of the stage, alive to the humorous possibilities of a plot based upon the errors arising from mistaken identity, is evident from the number of plays entitled $\Delta i \delta i v \mu o t$ of which fragments by writers of New and Middle Greek Comedy are extant. The mediaeval drama contains numerous instances of comedies with a similar plot-basis; and, passing on to the beginnings of the modern world, we find that, in Elizabethan stage parlance, the name 'Errors' was attached to comedies of this stamp as a kind of generic term, from which we may infer that they were not uncommon. In our own day, too, we have seen numbers of ephemeral farces wherein such 'Errors' afforded the flimsy substratum of a so-called plot.

Of direct imitations of the Menaechmi there are, on the other hand, comparatively few. Hercules I, Duke of Ferrara at the end of the fifteenth century, had Italian versions of plays by Plautus and Terence performed at his court ; among them was $I$ Menecmi, produced in 4486 . The earliest regular comedies, having any claim to originality of treatment, performed in mediaeval Italy (or, for that matter, in mediaeval Europe) were the plays of Cardinal Bibbiena. His Calandra, based upon the Menaechmi, was performed at Venice in 1508 , and published in $\mathbf{1 5 2 4}$. This was the first Italian comedy to be performed at the court of France, where it was acted by request of the sister of Henry II. Bibbiena made considerable changes in both plot and dialogue, among other alterations making the twins brother and sister ; and the predilections of an Italian prelate of that age are manifest in a grossness happily absent from the original. The Calandra was rapidly followed by two more Italian adaptations of the Menaechmi, which do not call for more than passing mention : I Lucidi, by Agnolo Firenzuola, a courtly dramatist of considerable merit; and I Simillimi, by Giovanni Trissino, who is chiefly known for his rather prosaic tragedy of Sophonisba, and who also wrote an epic poem of remarkable badness. Both these writers flourished in the first half of the sixteenth century.

The next direct imitation of the Menaechmi appeared in England, where a Historie of Error was enacted 'by the children of Powles'-i. e. boys of St. Paul's School ${ }^{1}$-' at Hampton Court on New Yere's daie at night, 1576-77'. Probably the same play (misnamed Historie of Ferrar) was performed at Windsor in 1582 . A few years later, in 1594 , a 'Comedy of Errors, like to Plautus his Menechmus' was performed at a Grand Night at Gray's Inn. This is identified by most Shakespearian scholars with Shakespeare's play, which is shown by internal evidence to have been first produced about 1591-2. Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, in dramatic skill, in characterization, and above all in dialogue, towers above all other derivatives of the Menaechmi ; and a reading of his play will show that his debt to Plautus is a very modest one, since

[^3]even the plot, beyond which his borrowing extended but little, was by his skill recast in a far more elaborate mould. It is not here proposed to enter into a detailed account of the differences between the plot of the Comedy and that of the Menaechmi; suffice it to say that Shakespeare doubles the confusion by the introduction of a second pair of twin brothersthe two Dromios, ${ }^{1}$ slaves to the two Antipholuses (whose originals are the Menaechmus brethren)-and introduces a pathetic background for the story in the separation by shipwreck of Aegeon and his wife, parents of the Antipholuses. The final ávarvopios is thus a triple one. The student is advised to read, side by side with this play, Shakespeare's Comedy, or at least the substance thereof in Lamb's Tales. ${ }^{2}$

It must be noted that Shakespeare derived his raw material, not direct from Plautus, but partly from the Historie of Error and partly from a translation of the Menaechmi by 'W. W.', ${ }^{\text {' }}$ published in 1595 , but, as is clear from the considerable number of verbal resemblances between the Comedy and W. W.'s translation, evidently seen by Shakespeare in manuscript. The title-page of this work is reproduced overleaf.

This version, which was of course made from an inferior text, is very free, and in places contains gross errors; on the other hand, it is spirited and brisk and amusingly quaint, as may be seen from the few brief extracts for which there is space in the Notes to this edition. [^5]both with the Menaechmi and with the Comedy will afford both instruction and entertainment. ${ }^{1}$

Three plays produced subsequently to the Comedy call for brief mention. Towards the end of his life, about 1705 , the French comic dramatist Regnard produced a play entitled Les Menechmes ou les Jumeaux. Its plot was derived from the Menaechmi, but the handling is weak and the dialogue frothy. Another adaptation appeared in Holland, where De Gelyke Treélingen was acted at Amsterdam about 1715. Lastly, about the middle of the eighteenth century, Carlo Goldoni, a Venetian by birth and the founder of modern Italian Comedy, produced a play based upon the Menaechmi entitled $I$ due gemelli Veneziani, which was, however, one of his less important pieces. It is curious to note that the plot of the Menaechmi has been utilized by several pioneers of changes in the comic dramaHercules of Ferrara, Bibbiena, Shakespeare, Goldoni. It may be said, in conclusion, that none of the imitators of this play, save only our own poet, improved upon their original.

6. Metres

I (a). The metres employed by Plautus and Terence are borrowed from Greek dramatic poetry. Since Latin was a stressed, while Greek was an unstressed, language, ${ }^{2}$ these metres in most cases required modification before they could be adapted to the Latin tongue. If we accept a theory which every fresh investigation tends to strengthen, ${ }^{3}$ it was the exception in Roman comic drama for ictus (verse-beat) to conflict with accent (word-stress) ; but, if the Greek metres had been reproduced therein without modification, such conflict must very frequently have occurred. By way of illustration let the Iambic Trimeter be taken. The Greek poets treated this [^6]verse of six feet as one of three ${ }^{1}$ dipodies or double-feet ( $\mu \epsilon ́ \tau \rho a)$ : strong ictus occurred once only in each dipody; and, though substitutes for the iambus ( $\cup \prime$ ) were allowed in the first foot of each dipody, yet in order to emphasize the iambic metrical basis the last foot of each dipody (i.e. every even foot) was kept invariably pure-nothing was allowed there but an iambus : since there was no word-stress for ictus to conflict with, this presented no difficulty. If the Roman comic dramatists had, in writing iambic verses, observed this dipodic law, ${ }^{2}$ ictus must frequently have fallen on the last syllable of iambic words, though such words were in Latin normally pronounced with a stress on the penultimate. ${ }^{3} \quad$ Plautus and Terence therefore allowed, under certain restrictions, substitutions for the metrical basis in every foot of a verse but the last, and reckoned a verse by feet instead of by double-feet: in other words they did not observe the dipodic law.

(b) Accordingly the Greek trimeter acatalectic* (threemeasure complete) became the Latin senarius (six-foot); the Greek tetrameter catalectic ${ }^{4}$ (four-measure incomplete) the Latin

1 Hence its Greek name.

2 The Augustan poets strictly observed the laws of Greek quantitative prosody, and therefore produced artificial verse which was at variance with the laws of Latin pronunciation. See Introd. 7, p. 35.
8 As it is, words frequently occur in Plantus and lerence bearing ictus on the final syllable: the explanation is that certain word-groups (e.g. uoluftís mea) were pronounced as a single word, and bore stress accordingly. See Introd. 7, pp. 38-40.
${ }^{4}$ Catalectic literally means 'ceasing', acatalectic 'not ceasing'. A catalectic line stops short, so to speak, before it is metrically complete: e. g. in the trochaic line

Úp and | down the | Cíty | Roád
the last foot stops short after the first syllable; both that foot and the whole line are catalectic. Contrast an acatalectic trochaic line such as Bérried | bráke and \| réedy | island.
In English poetry catalectic feet are very common, not only at the end of a verse, but also within it : contrast the anapaestic verse

I'm gó|ing oút | with the tide, | lád; | you'll díg | me a núm|ble gráve (where the fourth foot is catalectic) with the acatalectic septenarius (seven-foot) ${ }^{1}$; the Greek tetrameter acatalectic (four-measure complete) the Latin octonarius (eight-foot).
(c) The metres thus borrowed by Plautus and Terence are principally iambic and trochaic. In reckoning the metrical value of a foot, each short syllable counts as one mora or length-unit, each long syllable normally as two: strictly speaking, therefore, the only exact equivalent for the iambus ( $\cup-$ ) or the trochee $(-v)$ is the tribrach $(\cup \cup \cup) .^{2}$ But in the verse of Latin Comedy, as in all natural non-quantitative verse, a spondee pronounced rapidly may take the value merely of an iambus or trochee, the unstressed syllable not bearing ictus seeming to count as a single mora only. For this reason the spondee ( -- ) and its metrical equivalents, the dactyl ( $-\cup \cup$ ), anapaest ( $\checkmark \checkmark-)$, and proceleusmatic ( $\cup \cup \smile \cup$ ), are, under certain restrictions, admitted by Plautus and Terence as substitutes for iambi and trochees in those feet in which they allow substitution.
(d) In Greek poetry the trimeter had three, the tetrameter four, strong ictīs or main verse-beats, one in each of the odd feet (and so one only in each dipody); there was a weaker ictus in each of the even feet. The incidence of ictus in Latin iambic and trochaic verses is generally regarded as following the Greek rule: though it has also been conjectured that, as Plautus and Terence disregarded the dipodic arrangement, such vcrses, as written by them, bore a strong ictus in each foot. If the first of these two opinions is accepted as correct, the theory that strong ictus seldom conflicts with accent becomes almost self-evident; but the question is here left open, ${ }^{3}$ except that (as is reasonable) an ictus falling on the last syllable of a verse is regarded as distinctly weak.

[^7]II. The principal metres employed by Plautus are as follow:
A. The Iambic Senarius (= Greek Iambic Trimeter Acatalectic).
(a) This is a line of six feet, each of which is either an iambus ( $\cup \prime$ ) or some foot reckoned as the metrical equivalent of an iambus and permitted as a substitute therefor.
(b) In every foot but the last Plautus freely allows such substitutes; namely, the tribrach ( $\checkmark \cup \cup$; the only exact metrical equivalent) ; the spondee ${ }^{1}\left(-\frac{1}{)}\right.$; and the metrical equivalents of the spondee, namely, the anapaest $(\cup \cup \prime)$, the dactyl ( $-\cup \cup$ ), and (rarely) the proceleusmatic ( $\cup \cup \cup \cup)$.
(c) A dactyl is seldom followed by an anapaest: in other words, the concurrence of four short syllables is rare except in an actual proceleusmatic foot (for explanation of an apparent instance see 495 note).
(d) A dactyl is rare in the fifth foot; a proceleusmatic is rarely used, and occurs chiefly in the first foot (e.g.v. 229 of this play) ; an instance of a proceleusmatic in the second foot occurs in v. 253 of this play.
(e) The last foot is normally an iambus, but may be a pyrrhic ( $\cup$ ú). In other words, literary convention permitted a doubtful syllable (syllaba anceps) to stand at the end of a verse of this kind, as of nearly every other kind.
(f) As the collocation of two iambic words would entail a twofold conflict of accent with ictus, ${ }^{2}$ the line may not end with two iambic words ${ }^{3}$ except
(i) when change of speaker occurs between the fifth foot and the sixth ;
(ii) when there is elision immediately before the fifth foot or the sixth (e. g. 480);

^8 when two iambic words occur together in a word-group accented as a single word; e.g. 328 malam crucem, 750 patrém meum. ${ }^{1}$
(g) Caesura ${ }^{2}$ must occur either in the third foot (penthemimeral ${ }^{3}$ ) or in the fourth (hepthemimeral ${ }^{3}$ ); the penthemimeral is far the commoner. ${ }^{4}$ On the question of hiatus at caesura see Introd. 7. IV. C. b.
(h) The Iambic Senarius was used in Roman Comedy as the ordinary metre of Diverbia, i.e. narrative passages and spoken conversation or soliloquies of a quiet type (see Introd. 4). The action of the Menaechmi is so rapid that less than a third of it is written in this metre. Usually the proportion of Senarii is larger.
(i) Few whole poems or continuous passages of Iambic Senarii can be found in English poetry. On the other hand, the so-called Alexandrine which forms the last verse of a Spenserian stanza is written in this metre. An example is
They soúght, | O Álb|ion! néxt | thy seá- | encír|cled coást where the pause after Albion gives the effect of a penthemimeral caesura. Such a line as

The greát | World-vic|tor's víc|tor will| be seén | no móre gives the effect of a line with hepthemimeral caesura.
B. The Iambic Septenarius ( $=$ Greek Iambic Tetrameter Catalectic).
(a) This is a line of seven and a half iambic or quasi-iambic feet.
(b) It is a general rule, to which there are very few exceptions, that a diaeresis ${ }^{5}$ must occur between the fourth foot and the fifth. In this case the line must be regarded as falling into [^9]two hemistichs ${ }^{1}$ to the extent that the fourth foot must be a pure iambus; and may be so regarded to the extent that hiatus may occur at the diaeresis and that syllaba anceps may occur at the end of the fourth foot (i.e. a pyrrhic may in the fourth foot be reckoned as an iambus).

(c) In the rare cases where there is no such diaeresis caesura must occur in the fifth foot, and substitutes for the iambus are allowed in the fourth.
(d) With the exception mentioned in (b), any of the substitutes enumerated in A. (b) above is permitted in any of the complete feet, though a proceleusmatic is rare except in the first and fifth (i.e. the first foot of each hemistich).
(c) A dactyl is seldom followed by an anapaest ; cf. A. (c).
(f) The final half-foot consists of a single syllable, long or short (syllaba anceps).
(g) In this play the Iambic Septenarius occurs but rarely, and only in Cantica proper ( $133-4,980$ ).
(h) As an example of this metre in English may be quoted The Bríton névjer tér|givérs'd, || but wàs | for ád|verse drúb|bíng.
C. The Iambic Octonarius ( $=$ Greek Iambic Tetrameter Acatalectic).
(a) This is a line of eight iambic or quasi-iambic feet.
(b) The final foot must be a pure iambus, though syllaba anceps may occur at the end of the line (i. e. a pyrrhic may there be reckoned as an iambus).
(c) Otherwise the rules are the same as for the Iambic Septenarius (see B. b, c, d, e, above), except that neglect of the diaeresis is less rare. ${ }^{2}$ Proceleusmatics occur, as there, chiefly in the first foot (as in 987) or in the fifth (as in 1001).

^10 In the Menaechmi Iambic Octonarii occur either in Cantica proper (e.g. $121 \mathbf{1 - 2 , 1 2 8 - 9 , 1 3 1 - 2 , 9 8 6 - 7 ) ~ o r ~ i n ~ l i v e l y ~}$ passages of recitative (quasi-Cantica; see Introd. 4) such as 995-1005, 1060-2.
(e) As specimens of this metre in English may be mentioned Campbell's Hohenlinden and Byron's Mazeppa.
D. The Trochaic Septenarius ( $=$ Greek Trochaic Tetrameter Catalectic).
(a) This is a line of seven and a half feet, whereof each complete foot is either a trochee ( $-v$ ) or some foot reckoned as the metrical equivalent of a trochee and permitted as a substitute therefor.
(b) In every complete foot except the fourth and seventh Plautus freely allows such substitutes; namely, the tribrach ( $\cup \cup \cup$, the only exact metrical equivalent); the spondee ${ }^{1}$ $(--)$; and the metrical equivalents of the spondee, namely the dactyl $(\neg \cup \cup)$, the anapaest ( $\cup \cup-$ ), and (rarely) the proceleusmatic ( $\cup \cup \cup \cup) . ~$
(c) It is a general rule, to which there are very few exceptions, that a diaeresis must occur between the fourth foot and the fifth. In this case the line must be regarded as falling into two hemistichs to the extent that the fourth foot must be a trochee or its sole exact metrical equivalent, a tribrach; and may be so regarded to the extent that hiatus may occur at the diaeresis ${ }^{2}$ and that syllaba anceps may occur at the end of the fourth foot (i.e. in the fourth foot a spondee may be reckoned as a trochee, and an anapaest as a tribrach). The practical result is that before a diaeresis any substitute for the trochee may be allowed except a dactyl ${ }^{3}$ or a proceleusmatic.
${ }^{1}$ How the spondee could be regarded as a metrical equivalent of the trochee has been explained above, I. (c).
${ }^{2}$ For examples of such hiatus, which is very common, see Introd. 7. IV. C. a.

8 The apparent exception in 152 may be due to the elision at the end of the fourth foot there, which renders the diaeresis impure; but the line is corrapt.
(d) In the rare cases where there is no such diaeresis, any of the substitutes mentioned in (b) is allowed in the fourth foot.
(e) The seventh foot must be either a trochee or a tribrach.
(f) A dactyl is seldom followed by an anapaest: see A. (c) above.
(g) A proceleusmatic is rare except in the first and fifth (i.e. the first foot of each hemistich). In this play, however, proceleusmatics occur twice in the second foot ( 618,957 ), as well as in the fifth ( 1069 ).
(h) The final half-foot consists of a single syllable, long or short (syllaba anceps).
(i) With the exceptions mentioned in A. (f)-where the rule is explained-the line may not end with two iambic words, though endings of the permissible malám-crucem type occur often, e.g. $915,1017$.
(j) This is the metre ordinarily employed in passages of lively narrative or excited dialogue delivered in recitative (quasiCantica: see Introd. 4). More than half the Menaechmi is written in Trochaic Septenarii. It is curious that the first four continuous passages are of 97 lines each.
(k) In English this metre is frequently employed in comic verse ; e.g.

Mány a | státely | hóme he's | éntered, || bùt, with | únob-| trúsive | táct,
Hè has | né'er, in | páying | vísits, || cálled at|téntion | tò the | fáct.
E. The Trochaic Octonarius ( $=$ Greek Trochaic Tetrameter Acatalectic).
(a) This is a line of eight trochaic or quasi-trochaic feet.
(b) The rules governing the Trochaic Septenarius (see D. b, c, $\mathrm{d}, \mathrm{f}, \mathrm{g}$ ), are observed in the Trochaic Octonarius with the following modifications:
(i) The substitutes mentioned in D. (b) are permitted in all feet but the fourth and eighth (they are allowed in the seventh).
(ii) The rule stated in D. (c), regarding substitution in the fourth foot when followed by diaeresis, is observed in the eighth foot as well. In other words neither a dactyl nor a proceleusmatic is allowed in the final foot.
(c) Neglect of the diaeresis-rule is less rare. When it occurs there is a caesura in the fourth or fifth foot, as well as permission of any substitute in the fourth foot (cf. 977 in this play).
(d) A proceleusmatic is rare except in the first foot (cf. ing) and the fifth (e.g. in $773-4,{ }^{1} 978$ ); it occurs in the second in 977.
(e) In this play, with the exception of a single line (r007) occurring in a boisterous passage, the Trochaic Octonarius appears only in Cantica proper (e.g. if9, 590-r, 594, 773-4, 977-8, 982).
(f) This metre is not often employed by English writers, but an example may be found in

Chárlotte, | háving | seén his | bódy || bórne beffóre her | òn a | shútter,
Like a | wéll-con|dúcted | pérson, || wént on | cútting | bréad and | bútter.
F. A detailed analysis of the metres employed in the Cantica proper is beyond the scope of the present edition; but a few remarks may be of use. Besides the Iambic Septenarius and the Iambic and Trochaic Octonarii, shorter iambic and trochaic metres are not uncommon in the Cantica, usually appearing in conjunction with other rhythms ; but most frequent are systems of which the metrical basis is either
(a) the Anapaest ( $\cup\llcorner$ ); e.g. $357-8,36 \mathrm{r}-4,367-8$
${ }^{1}$ If eiius is read there.

602-3, 983-4. The general effect of the rhythm may be illustrated by such lines as

Who can sée | the green eárth | any móre |
As she wás | by the soúr|ces of tíme?
or (b) the Bacchius ( $\cup-$-); e.g. 571 -9, 753-72, 966-71. An exact illustration can hardly be obtained from English verse. Less common are systems based upon the Cretic ( $-\cup-$; cf. 112-13, 115-18, 580), or the Choriambus ( $-\cup \cup ー$; cf. I ro).

7. Prosody

The apparent irregularities and inconsistencies of Plautine prosody are for the most part to be explained by reference to Plautus's chronological position. Early Latin verse-written in the native Saturnian metre ${ }^{1}$-and Latin popular verse of all ages depended for its rhythm, like the verse of all Indo-European languages except Greek, upon word- and sentence-accent, and therefore upon quantity only indirectly. Greek prosody, on the other hand, is wholly based upon quantity ${ }^{2}$ whether natural or artificial (i.e. determined by position). The reason why Greek verse holds this anomalous position is that, while all other Indo-European languages were and are stressed-one syllable or more in each word being emphasized in pronuncia-tion-, Greek was unstressed and admitted only variations in [^11]voice-pitch or musical tone. ${ }^{1}$ Furthermore, in the Latin tongue as spoken, quantity was considerably influenced by accent ${ }^{2}$ or stress, while the absence of stress in Greek resulted in the retention of original quantities and therefore in a quantitative prosody governed by fixed and strict rules.

The Roman Comic Dramatists, feeling the need of some medium of expression more finished and artistic than the rough accentual metre of early Latin verse, turned naturally to their models, the plays of the New Greek Comedy, for their metres as well as for their plots and characters, and adopted in its broad outlines the Greek quantitative prosody. At the same time, however, in the determining of quantity they were influenced largely by the practice of every-day speech; they regulated quantity (especially the quantity of syllables long by position and of the final syllables of iambic words) rather by the natural word- and sentence-accent than by the strict rules followed by Greek poets. Ennius, who borrowed the Greek hexameter, approxinated more closely, in his treatment of quantity, to Greek models. ${ }^{3}$ The final development is reached in the precise quantitative prosody of the Augustan poets and their imitators, who followed strict rules that were to some extent at variance with the natural rhythm of the Latin tongue. ${ }^{4}$ In this respect Plautus and Terence may be called more truly Latin poets than Virgil, Horace, or Ovid ${ }^{5}$; they were adapters rather than imitators of Greek prosody.

[^12]The apparent anomalies of Plautine prosody are due, then, partly to his chronological position midway between the age of the native accentual prosody and that of the exotic strictly quantitative prosody, and partly to his endeavour to effect a compromise between the latter and the natural stressed pronunciation of Latin. ${ }^{1}$ These important facts were not realized until a comparatively recent date. For long ages the prosody of Roman Comic drama remained a riddle apparently insoluble. Nor was the solution forthcoming as long as no canons were recognized except those of the Augustan age. Ritschl was the first scholar to put the metres of Plautus on a rational basis. He first pointed out that, though Plautus's metre was quantitative, some regard was taken of the accent which words bore in ordinary speech; and that the words which fall into the metrically unaccented parts of any line are generally 'sentenceenclitics', i.e. words of no special importance. Ritschl's theories were confirmed and further developed by his successors in the field of Plautine research, who demonstrated that the shortening of long syllables, the occurrence of hiatus, ${ }^{2}$ and the other apparent irregularities of Plautine prosody, followed definite laws of their own ; and that these laws were generally to be explained in part by the influence of ordinary pronunciation, in part by that of metrical ictus. Among the leading scholars of the Ritschelian school may be mentioned Langen and Klotz, whose conclusions, still further elaborated by Brix, ${ }^{3}$ were introduced to English students by the labours of Sonnenschein.4 Their explanation of the most striking peculiarity of

[^13]Plautine prosody is summed up in the so-called Law of Breves Breviantes, which is thus enunciated by Sonnenschein: 'A long syllable may be treated as short when it is both preceded by a short syllable and either preceded or followed by an ictus.'

Recent investigations tend to show that both the name'Short (syllables) Making (others) Short '-and the wording of this Law are misleading : that accent, rather than either ictus or the presence of a preceding short syllable, was primarily the determining cause of shortening. And indeed, it was the chief and perhaps the only serious fault of Ritschl's immediate followers that they attributed too much influence to ictus. Further investigators in the same field, among whom Seyffert, Studemund, and Lindsay ${ }^{1}$ hold a foremost place, have demonstrated that in the verse of Plautus accent plays a far more important part than ictus in the determination of quantity ; that, owing to Plautus's skill in arrangement, accented syllables are, as a general rule, placed in those parts of the line which receive ictus ${ }^{2}$; and that the apparent exceptions to this rule admit, in a large number of cases, of clear and convincing explanation.

Their explanations may be roughly summarized as follows. In ordinary Latin speech of the classical era words received their accents according to a principle known as the Penultima Law, by which disyllables were accented on the penultimate, polysyllables on the penultimate or the ante-penultimate according as the penultimate was long or short. ${ }^{3}$ In the verse of Plautus apparent conflict between accent and ictus occurs most frequently ( I ) in certain words of more than three syllables where ictus falls on the first syllable; (2) in words where ictus falls on the last syllable.' Exceptions of the first

[^14]kind are confined to quadrisyllables with the first three syllables short, or of the type consilium. The explanation is that in Plautus's day such words were still subject to the influence of an older system of accentuation of which unmistakable traces are found. According to this earlier law all words were accented on the first syllable irrespective of length or quantity. There is therefore no real conflict between ictus and accent in words like mílieres, fácilius as they occur in Plautus's verse ${ }^{1}$ (cf. Men. $3^{21}, 978$ ). Words of the consilium type sometimes retain the older accentuation (as cónsilium), sometimes follow the newer system (as consilium); they were in a transitional stage. ${ }^{2}$

Difficulties of the second class-where ictus falls on a final syllable-are less amenable to explanation. With regard perhaps to the majority of the very numerous instances of an iambic word occurring at the end of a line ${ }^{3}$ it can only be said that the ictus falling on the final syllable of a line is of the secondary or weaker variety, so that the conflict of ictus with accent is not harsh. Of instances of other kinds, those namely in which ictus falls on a final syllable elsewhere in a line, many may be satisfactorily explained by reference to sentence-accent. In ordinary speech certain words, as appearing in certain recurring word-groups, receive a different accent from that which they would bear if pronounced separately ; e.g. uolúptas a final short syllable following a long one, and are normally accented in classical Latin on the final remaining syllable, e.g. words of the types cuicís ( = cuiátis), adduic ( = addúce), posthác ( $=$ post-há-ce), credin ( = credisne). Further, some cases have been explained by reference to a supposed law that when a final syllable was elided the accent was shifted one foot nearer the beginning of a word; but this is doubtful.

1 Words of this type were normally accented thus even in Latin of the best period.
${ }^{2}$ The change in the system of accentuation seems to have arisen as follows. Polysyllables naturally acquired a secondary weaker accent, e.g. tolerdre, tempestatious (cf. in Eng. légiondries); gradually the principal and the secondary accent changed places, and this novel accentuationsystem was extended until it became the universal rule.
${ }^{s}$ Or at the end of the first hemistich of a long iambic line.
or mísero in many collocations bear the ordinary accent, but in word-groups such as uoluptás-mea, uaé miseró-miki the accent is dragged forward by the unimportant words or 'sentenceenclitics' following the words in question. To put it differently, word-groups of this kind are treated as single words and accented accordingly. Lindsay makes a full classification of sentence-enclitics which may thus affect accentuation; a brief outline may here be given, with the addition of a few examples taken at random from this play:
(a) all parts of the verb esse, auxiliary or copulative; e.g. 654 defessí sumus ; similarly es and est frequently coalesce with a preceding word, as 41 surríptust, 293 moléstu's, &c. (Probably in these cases es and the two first letters of est disappear altogether : i. e. we should write surruptus't, molestus.)
(b) possessive pronouns when unemphatic; e.g. 300 crám meam, 597 oculis inspexí meis, 750 patrém meum (see Introd. 6. II. A. f. iii).
(c) personal pronouns when unemphatic; e.g. 396 ire infitiás mihi ; cf. 640 mé rogas? (emphatic) pol hau rogém te (unemphatic).
(d) a verb which is used with a noun to express an action that might be expressed by a verb alone, as frequently do and facio, e.g. 61 dotatám dedit, 99 medicinám facit, ${ }_{1} 76$ forés ferio, 343 a mittuint domum, 630 tetulí pedem.
(e) nouns of subordinate meaning, such as res, modus, &c., e. g. 84 aliquó modo, 3 I 7 illóc modo; here we may place such groups as malám crucem, 66, 328 ; and expressions of time such as intereá loci 446, trigintá dies 95 I (cf. 91 cottídie).
(f) similarly prepositions coalesce with a governed word following; e.g. 9I ád fation, 684 ád forum; so frequently $a b$ se, &c.

It may, then, be enunciated as a formal law that Plautine prosody depends mainly upon the word- and sentence-accentuation of ordinary speech; but that Plautus so constructs his verses that the rhythm produced by the metrical ictus as a rule corresponds with the natural accentuation. Certain features of ordinary pronunciation, which are reproduced in Plautus's verse, may here be summarized :
I. In many cases syllables which later poets scanned as long were in ordinary speech pronounced as short, owing to the influence of word-accent: e.g. (A) the accentuation, in ordinary speech, of the first syllable in iambic words (or word-groups) such as dómi, máne, &c., tended to the shortening of the final syllable; (B) on the other hand, the stressing of the penultimate in polysyllabic words (or word-groups) such as uoluptátem, senectútem, & c., tended to the shortening of a long antepenultimate: these two rules explain most instances of the so-called Law of Breves Breviantes. (C) A few unimportant words of very frequent occurrence, such as ille and iste in all cases, were normally unaccentuated in popular speech; when used emphatically, however, they bore the usual accent on the penultimate. (D) In rapid conversation final -s after a short vowel was frequently dropped before an initial consonant (e.g. nimi' stulte), and before an initial vowel when a participle in $-u s$ or adjective in $-u s$ or $-i s$ preceded es or est (e.g. emortuost, tristest $=$ tristis est $:$ but see above, p. 39 (a), and I. D. c below).
II. Ordinary pronunciation slurred many words, in which two or more vowels occurred in conjunction, in such a way that the vowels coalesced (synizesis). Thus meo, hūūs, dīes were frequently pronounced as monosyllables; t"̄оrum, $\overline{e a m u s, ~ \& c ., ~}$ as disyllables. Cf. the old story about Caunias and caue ne eas (i. e. c $\overline{a u e} n e \overline{e a s}$ ). ${ }^{1}$
III. In certain word-endings which had become normally short before the age of the Augustan poets, the original long quantity seems, in spite of the accent-influence, occasionally to have affected the pronunciation of Plautus's day. This may be inferred from the fact that the original long quantity of the verb-terminations -it, -et, of the noun-termination -or, and of the comparative endings, -or, -us (to give a few instances) is occasionally reproduced by Plautus.
IV. With regard to the much-discussed question of hiatus it is more difficult to find a basis for Plautine usage in popular speech. It may, however, be conjectured that, while as a general rule a final vowel or vowel $+m$ was slurred in speech before a following initial vowel, yet in certain combinations and word-groups such final syllables retained part of their value ; and that Plautus's treatment of certain constantly recurring phrases showing hiatus, ${ }^{1}$ such as eŭ hércle, eúu ĕdepol, tư̆ ŭstic, sĭ ămas, cŭm ěo, dứm ěo, flagitiưm hớminis, Scc., exactly reproduces their popular pronunciation. ${ }^{2}$ Again, by the law of inertia the influence of the original final $-d$ of the ablative must have still affected speech for some time after the $-d$ had ceased to be actually pronounced. ${ }^{3}$ Lastly, in ordinary conversation a final vowel or vowel $+m$, normally slurred before a following initial vowel, would naturally retain its full value if a pause of any kind occurred before the ensuing word. ${ }^{4}$ The fact that Plautus allows hiatus in certain combinations, avoids it in others, and in others again uses hiatus or elision indiscriminately, would probably admit of easy explanation if we had a complete knowledge of the laws of Latin pronunciation.

It remains to give instances collected from this play of those peculiarities of Plautine prosody which reproduce the features of ordinary pronunciation as enumerated above. The sections which follow are numbered and lettered to correspond with the summary given in the preceding paragraphs, to which reference should be made when necessary. In accordance with the general practice the position of the metrical ictus is indicated [^15]in the instances given below; but impartial examination will show that in the great majority of these instances the ictus falls on a syllable bearing word- or sentence-accent, i.e. a syllable which would be stressed in ordinary conversation. One further warning : in what follows the terms long and short are, for convenience' sake, used in the ordinary way, i. e. of syllables which Augustan poets treated as long and short respectively.

I. Shortening of Long Syllables.

A. A long syllable may be (and commonly is) scanned as short if the preceding syllable is short and bears ictus ${ }^{1}$
(a) in disyllabic words (including words of three syllables made disyllabic by elision), an iambus being thus weakened to a pyrrhic:
(i) when the vowel of the final syllable is either long by position or long by both position and nature, as 16 ádĕst
 689 dedīsti ĕ|am; $786 \mathrm{mi} \mid$ pàtēr, cạulere; S60 ĕnı̆m uē|ro; 389 द́gŏn tē|, cf. $653 ; 828$ uîdĕn tu īllic ; 527 nờuŏm | reconcinna|rier (though perhaps this is an instance of synizesis; cf. 542, and see II. e. below).
(ii) when the word ends in a long vowel ; chiefly in the case of imperatives, as 179-80 mánc̆, 416 tắç̆, 5 7 7 iưbü, 934, 994 cáuc̆, 225 rédŭ.
(b) in word-groups wherein an iambus occurs : more definitely, when a word of one short syllable (or a word of two syllables of which the first is short and the second elided) is followed by a word forming or beginning with a long syllable having a vowel or $h$ as its first letter, this long syllable is commonly treated as short when the preceding short syllable bears ictus ${ }^{1}$ : as 222 égo ĕt Mfenlaechmus, cf. 1009; 530 scin quîd

B. A long syllable may be (and often is) scanned as short if the preceding syllable is short and the succeeding syllable bears ictus :
(a) in polysyllabic words having the first syllable short, the second long, and ictus on the third: here the second syllable is treated as short, e. g. 259 uŏlüptáa|rii ; 37 Syrrăcūt sas (contrast 40S, 1097 Sy̆|rácū|sis) ; this example, however, as occurring in the Prologue, may be a faulty imitation of Plautine scansion ; instances of the shortening of vowels long by nature occurring in a polysyllabic word are to be regarded as doubtful.
(b) in word-groups wherein a bacchius ${ }^{1}$ occurs: more definitely, when of three consecutive syllables, belonging to two or more words, the first is a short initial syllable, the second is long, and the third bears ictus, the second syllable is commonly shortened : either
(i) when it is long by position or long by both position and nature, as 384 quĭd hŏc | sít, cf. i 129-30; 983 mètum ĭd mừhi $\breve{a} d \mid$ hibeam ; 89 ăprïd mên $\mid s a m ; 253$ tămèn né̛quĕlo; 309 hic $\mid$
 ěrăt $\mid$ dîcto $; 983$ lŏci sìm |; 1028 si tươm | nĕ́găs (though perhaps this is a case of synizesis; cf. 588 clü̆ns quitdam, and see II. b. below) ; 229 quăsi ăduĕ́nt̄ens; a double instance in is in such a vast majority of cases the rule that the short syllable which precedes the shortened syllable is an initial syllable, that one regards with suspicion instances such as 152 habe|ắmŭs ăt|que hưnc; the text is doubtful; see notes ad loc.).
(ii) when it is long by nature only; chiefly in the case of imperatives, as 1106 rŏgă: | rêspon|debo; 291 iübĕ tê $\mid$; 348 ${ }^{1}$ Or a paeonic ( $\cup-\cup \cup$ ), i. e. a resolved bacchius.
tăcü-dùm $1 ; 603$ mănĕ: mắle err $\mid i t$; so in the case of long final vowels of ablatives, as 602 uĭrŏ mế $\mid$ mălŏ máăe |; so when the

C. The first syllables of certain frequently occurring demonstratives (esp. ille and iste) are normally treated as short, though scanned as long when the words are used emphatically. Employed in conversation much in the same way as our articles, they were normally unaccentuated, and tended to lose the unflexed and therefore unimportant first syllable (cf. French $l e$, $l a$, les $=$ illum-am-os, &c.). Instances falling under this head are, as will readily be observed, merely special cases of A. (b) or B. (b), as :
(a) when ictus falls on a preceding short (or shortened) syllable (cf. A. b): 22 ūt quâdem îlle, cf. 336 ; 604 né illam è|castor, cf. 837 ; 606 quăd zillūc|, cf. 682, 789, 958, 962, 997 ;
 nừm šstāed; 65I tưّ isstīd, cf. 653, 937; it is best to scan 673 heû́s ! éc|quǐs hǔc as a case of A. (b).
(b) when the preceding syllable is short and the succeeding syllable bears ictus (cf. B. b) : 23 द̆go üllốs|, cf. 41, 46, 246, 535 ; 536 übi ìllae à́r|millae; 853 haū măle îllánc, cf. $86 \mathrm{I}, 994$; 94 ưta îstáec|, cf. 265, 528; 145 sèd quìd is $\mid$ tâe, cf. 391, 791, 809. Similarly with eccum, \&c. (cf. French celui $=$ ecce illum), as 275 sĕd ĕccutm, 565 sĕd ĕccám. A good instance of the contrast between the emphatic and the ordinary treatment of such words occurs in Mill. 972 si îllă uolt ) ( 973 quŭd illấ faciemus concubinä?, where îllā is merely an article.
D. Final -s following a shert vowel may in some cases be disregarded in scansion : ${ }^{1}$
(a) before an initial consonant, in disyllables with the first syllable short. Here the disregard of the final -s reproduces the rapid pronunciation of an iambic word accented on the first syllable and ending in -s. Instances ${ }^{1}$ It is frequently disregarded by Ennius and Lucretius.
falling under this head are merely special cases of A. (a) or B. (b), as :
(i) when the ictus falls on the preceding syllable (cf. A. a):
 quắbư' | dictis, cf. $94 \mathrm{I}, 955 ; 769$ êst mớdŭ' | tamen ; 92I prĭŭ quām |; roz8 si tuom | nêgăs mĕ|esse; instances of sătīn, uidě̃n (= satīsne, uidēsne) fall under the same rule, e.g. 18 r

(ii) when the ictus falls on the succeeding syllable (cf. B. b) : 81 nı̆mı̆' stū̀|te, cf. 94, 588, 701; 208 tribŭu' | nôbis, cf. 1027; 363 măğ̀ quám | dơmŭ tưuă | dŏmŭ quom hắec | tua sit; 603 sătí'. sí | sapiam.
(b) before an initial consonant, in disyllables with the first syllable long. This occurs chiefly in experimental metres, the slurred syllable coming between two long syllables both bearing accent and one ictus, e. g. (bacchiacs) 753 hốc $\bar{u} \mid s \breve{u}$ fácto ést, cf. 757, 760 , 975 ; (cretics) 113 fáxis, fäx lo. In verse $55^{6}$ síquis, if right, must be scanned as a pyrrhic; but see note ad loc. The rule that the fourth foot of an Iambic Octonarius, when followed by diaeresis, must be pure (Introd. 6. II. C. c) makes it probable that in 999 we should scan quō fề $\mid t i \bar{s} m$ mé, and even extend the licence to include polysyllables, so as to scan dưbưtát|ť̆s iáam in 995.
(c) before an initial vowel. This occurs only when a participle in -us (-os) or an adjective in -us (os) or -is is followed by es or est, and is probably due to the fragmentary pronunciation of the auxiliary or copula. (Possibly molestu's, surruptust, &c. should be written molestus, surruptus't, &c.) That the determining cause was pronunciation and not metre is evident from the fact that the final syllable thus formed by coalescence sometimes bears the metrical ictus. A few instances only need be given :
(i) accent in agreement with ictus: 4I qui $\mid$ sūrrùp $\overline{\hat{p}} \mid t \bar{u} s t$
${ }^{1}$ So uiden ut is scanned by Vergil and Ovid.
 1104; 1063 tam con|sìmilēst | quam poitest (where perhaps it would be better to write consimilist $=$ consimilis $(e s) t)$.
(ii) ictus on final syllable: $3{ }^{12}$ non $\mid$ sān $\bar{u} ' s \mid$ satis, cf. 946 ; of line ; cf. 404, 484).
E. One or two more peculiarities of Plautine scansion, and a few particular cases, may be given a place under the head of Shortening :
(a) Plautus never, like later poets, avoids leaving a final short vowel before words beginning with such combinations as $s c, s m, s p, s q$, st.
(b) Plautus never lengthens a short vowel before a combination of mute and liquid in the same word (e. g. patria, agros always have first syllable short). The scansion of quî nĕc le|gés 580 may be an extension of this rule, but the shortening of nec is probably due to its position between two accented syllables both long.
(c) The shortening of long final vowels where hiatus occurs (e.g. tư̆ üstic) is illustrated under the heading Hiatus (see below, IV. A. a).
(d) A few cases of apparent shortening do not fall under any of the rules given above. In some instances shortening may be due to final $-m$ losing its consonantal power (i.e. merely nasalizing the preceding vowel), e.g. $59^{2}$ dîxěrăm | cốntrouorsi|am, $9{ }^{6} 6$ primŭŭŭm.|quín; both these lines, however, are probably corrupt ; see notes ad loc. Some cases need the application of surgery; e. g. in 39 Tărĕn|tit es se is an impossible scansion, though it may, as occurring in the Prologue, be an erroneous imitation of Plautine prosody.

II. Synizesis.

The same practical result as is obtained by the shortening of long syllables under certain circumstances is procured in certain other cases by Synizesis, ${ }^{1}$ a process by which two or more separate successive vowel-sounds are fused into one syllable (as in the Cockney pronunciation of noze, out, &c.). That synizesis, as occurring in the plays of Plautus and Terence, reproduces a peculiarity of pronunciation, is evident from two considerations: (i) they allow it only in a limited number of words and inflexions of words; (ii) examination of instances will show that, in words liable to contraction by synizesis, the accent falls, as a rule, in the uncontracted word, on one or other of the successive vowel-sounds, and is therefore borne, in the contracted word, by the syllable resulting from vowel-fusion ; that in the majority of cases metrical ictus also falls on the contracted syllable ; and that, when it does not, an explanation can be found in the incidence of sentence-accent (see above, pp. 38-40).

In this play synizesis occurs in the following classes of words :
(a) Cases of is and idem, and genitives of qui, quis, and hic ${ }^{2}$ : as (i. bearing ictus) $35 \frac{1}{e a}\left|q u e ; 892 \frac{1}{e a}\right|$ te caus $\mid$ sa, cf. 1060;
 1135 hulus : (ii. not bearing ictus) $59 \overline{e l} ; 15 \mathrm{I} \overline{e o} ; 749 \overline{e o d e ́ t m \mid d i e ~(a ~}$ word-group accentuated on the antepenultimate) ; 1090 ēan'dém.
(b) Cases of meus, tuos, suos: as (i) 8 r méa, cf. 200, 783,905 , 1029; 202 mề̀s; 394 méaé (emphatic); 372 tuts; 393 túa, cf. $79^{2} ; 658$ tйam (emphatic) ; 902 sîo (emphatic) ; 188 tū ést ; 804 mea órnamenta: (ii) 726 tuos món|res (a word-group; cf. p. 39) ; 1028 sí tuom| nếrăs (perhaps a case of I. B. b. i).
(c) Cases of deus, dies, and a few similar nouns: (i) 812 dèosque; 1053 dêum fi|dem (a word-group); $154-5$ d $\frac{1}{\text { és }}$ 1013
 ómnis (Iouem deosque is a word-group with accent falling on the second syllable when the -que is elided; contrast 811-12); possibly 588 ct̄̄ens quíldam (more probably a case of I. B. b. i).

[^17]（d）A few verb－inflexions：as（i）I7 fúut，514－15 fuits｜se； 387 éamus，cf． 422 ，II 54 ：（ii） $885 \bar{a} \bar{i} t$（so frequently）．
（e）Possibly some words in which intervocal $u$ occurs：as （i） 527 nouom（more probably a case of I．A．a．i）：（ii） 344 n $\overline{a u r s}$（but see note ad loc．）．
（f）Certain compound words：as（i） 376 pracut，cf． $935 ; 769$ q品京d； 802 prachibet； 953 prồnde； 782 prồn tū（tu unem－ phatic）：（ii） 327 prōn tíu（tu emphatic）．

III．Lengthening of Short Syllables．

Certain terminations，among which may here be noted conjugation－endings in $-i s,-a t$ ，$-e t$ ，$-i t$ ，and comparative－endings －or，us，were originally of long quantity；influence of accent gradually weakened the value of these final syllables until， by the time of the Augustan poets，they were almost invariably treated as short before an initial vowel．In Plautus＇s time they were in the final stage of transition，and their treatment as short by nature was the rule；yet under the influence of metrical ictus the original long quantity was occasionally retained by the comic dramatists ；more rarely，an indisputably short syllable was thus lengthened．It will be seen that this suffix－lengthen－ ing occurs often before a pause and invariably in syllables bearing ictus：e．g．
（a）conjugation－endings： 943 童s èmissus（es is always scanned as long by Plautus and Terence）； 487 quĩd ăt̀s， 1 hŏmŏ（probably a word－group common in conversation）；iroi emerlís ār｜gento； 203 dec｜ét ănì｜matos； 52 uélitt，｜audac｜ter（at pause）； 759 quom er｜ $\bar{i} t$ ．àbëlo（at change of speaker）； 1045 factus $\mid$ sitt， $\bar{a} \mid$ me（at pause，cf．755）；i I60 uènìlbît－ūx｜or（pause before comic mapà $\pi \rho о \sigma \delta о к i ́ a v)$ ．Of these cases，only 203 and 956 are doubtful． （b）comparative－endings ： 327 lon｜giūs｜ab ae｜dibus； 846 ampli］$\frac{1}{4}$ ．$\check{e} n \mid i m$（at change of speaker）．Though these instances have been doubted, they present no real difficulty. The IndoEuropean comparative suffix-stem was -iyans-, which gave rise to Greek -t $\omega \nu^{\text {- ( }}$ (shortened to tov in all cases but nom. sing. m. and f.) and Latin -iōs- ( $=-$ ions- $)$. The latter became -iör- in inflexions by rhotacism of medial $-s$, and in nom. sing. was finally weakened to -iör, -iüs.
(c) Other instances: $506 \sin |c i \not p \bar{u} t|$, intel $\mid$ lego (at pause before parenthetic word). Here the lengthened syllable may originally have been long (caput $=$ caputs ? cf. praeceps = praecipets). Two further cases, namely, 84I tampadi|bû̀s är|denti|bus, 887 du'cĕrề $\mid$ medicum (?), can be explained only by the influence of ictus. Possibly both lines are corrupt ${ }^{1}$; see notes $a d$ loc.

IV. Hiatus.

With regard to the 'permission of hiatus' ${ }^{2}$ by the comic dramatists, three facts should be clearly realized: first, many phrases found in Plautus and Terence in which hiatus occurs are common phrases of every-day life reproduced with their ordinary pronunciation; secondly, a final syllable capable of elision, if for any reason a distinct pause occurred after it, would in conversation (as in the comic drama) normally retain its full value before an initial vowel-sound. Thirdly and especially, the difference, in respect of permission of hiatus, ${ }^{2}$ between the comic dramatists and the Augustan poets was one of metrical treatment only, not of pronunciation. To put it more clearly : in reading such a passage of Vergil as Aenean fundantem arces ac tecta nouantem Conspicit ; atque illi stellatus iaspide fulua Ensis erat, Tyrioque ardebat murice laena Demissa ex umeris . . .

an educated Roman would not have been guilty of emitting
${ }^{1}$ The instance in 841 may be justified by Vergil, Aen iv. 64 péctoribúus inhíáns.
${ }^{2}$ This phrase is used for convenience' sake in place of some such correct but clumsy expression as: retention of metrical value, wholly or partially, by syllables capable of elision but not elided before initial vowel or $k$.
such barbarous cacophonies (all too familiar to the schoolmaster) as fundantarces - atkilli - Tyriokardebat - demissex umeris. He would certainly have slurred the terminations in question, but the slurred syllables would still have been recognizable. The point in which the comic dramatists differed from the Augustan poets was that the former frequently did, while the latter as a rule did not, reckon such slurred syllables as part of a metrical foot. The Augustan poets ${ }^{1}$ consciously adopted, as far as metre was concerned, the Greek treatment of elided syllables. The reason why the Greeks did not count such syllables in the scansion was that in ordinary speech their elision was not a slurring merely, ${ }^{2}$ but the actual dropping of a vowel-sound, such as may be heard in the northern counties of England, where 'down the street', 'in the beck', 'over the fell' are actually pronounced 'doont' strate', 'int' beck', 'owert' fell'. In adopting strict rules of elision the Augustan poets were borrowing tastelessly from Greece a second metrical usage-the first being quantitative prosody-which, while perfectly adapted to the Greek tongue, was totally foreign to the genius and natural pronunciation of the Latin language.

On the other hand Plautus, who in this respect as in others was far more truly a representative of genuine Roman literature, followed the natural practice of reckoning or disregarding a slurred syllable in scansion according to the requirements of metre. Such a practice should present no difficulty to the student of English literature, who will frequently find a syllable, word, or phrase reckoned in the scansion in this passage, and disregarded metrically in that, and who will not feel it necessary to give it a grotesque pronunciation in the latter case. Shakespeare writes, as the last three feet of a line,

Ay. Fáre | you wéll, | fair géntleman

[^18]without expecting Celia to abbreviate the last word ; on the other hand he gives the word its full metrical value in other lines such as Polonius's
'Good sír', | or sò, | or 'friénd', | or 'gén|tlemàn'.
To summarize briefly, Plautus, though freely using elision, frequently allows syllables capable of elision ${ }^{1}$ either part of their metrical value (especially in certain frequently recurring phrases), or full metrical value (before pauses in metre, sense, or delivery). It may be added that instances of both these natural methods occur, though comparatively rarely, in the works of the Augustan poets.

Instances of Hiatus in this play may be classified as follows:
A. Hiatus is frequently allowed, in certain constantly recurring phrases, after certain monosyllables capable of elision :
(a) ending in a long vowel or diphthong (chiefly $t u$, si, and parts of qui), the vowel or diphthong retaining half its value only, i. e. being shortened: as,
(i) when the unelided syllable bears ictus: II5 (a cretic) quŏ́ ĕgo ĕām, cf. 618; 789 quŏ́ ĕāt 374 quaĕ́ hŏmŭnem, cf.
 744 quèm tư hŏ|minem; 789 né हैd ōp|serues; 238 s ăclum, cf.

(ii) when the unelided syllable does not bear ictus: 9 quŏ $\left.\frac{1}{t} \right\rvert\,$ lud ; 502 sĭ aé $\mid q u o m$ (to be read si-y-aequom, cf. 578 sit ést paū|per); 47 I nı̆ hấnc| (doubtful); 513 quía |tŭ ês (tu emphatic, due partly to loss of old ablative-ending $-d$, as 1028 (at diaeresis) négăs $m$ ĕ $\mid$ ésse, cf. 7 I 3 (where hiatus may be justified on other grounds). Most of the instances under this head have suffered unnecessary emendation, since it has been denied by certain authorities that hiatus may occur after

[^19]a monosyllable which does not bear ictus. The criterion, however, is properly pronunciation, not metre ; and, to take but one case, an emphatic $t u$ such as occurs in 379 or 513 would be but little slurred in conversation, and therefore could surely have been permitted by Plautus to stand in hiatus, even though lacking ictus. Indeed, the ordinary Plautine usage seems to be that a monosyllable standing in hiatus bears, or does not bear, ictus according to the natural accentuation of the word-group in which it occurs. It is evident, then, that he follows conversational usage. ${ }^{1}$
(b) ending in $-m$ following a vowel (chiefly iam, nam, num, $d u m, c u m$, and parts of $q u i$ ), such monosyllables being treated as short: as,
(i) when the unelided syllable bears ictus: 194-5 iắm ŏpōrıtébat, cf. 405, 519 ; 808 iăm ĕgo ēx | hóc, cf. $954 ; 413$ nŭm ìstaēc |; 449 dưm hië $\mid t o ́, ~ c f . ~ 93 ; 482$ rēs cừm ĕ|a essét, cf. 188 cưm ütrō|; 1054 quöm ĕgo āc|cîrro; 903 quêm ĕğ̈|, cf. II $33 ; 393$
 cf. 695 .
(ii) when the unelided syllable does not bear ictus: 292
 quăm | aéta|tí, cf. $497 ; 737$ đ̀tă | rèm ês $\mid$ se, cf. 453. Instances falling under this head have suffered emendation, but unnecessarily; see a. (ii) above.
B. Hiatus is sometimes allowed after certain disyllabic words, namely, (a) words normally scanned according to necessity as iambi or pyrrhics (especially mihuĭ, tibū̆, sübü, ĕgŏ, hŏmō), such words when they occur in hiatus being scanned as pyrrhics, e.g.
(i) when ictus falls on the first syllable of the word: 840

${ }^{1}$ Occasionally Augustan poets revert to the natural usage, as Verg. Ecl. instances the unelided syllable bears no ictus. Similar phrases in Plautus (as Men. 194-5 nâm sĭ d̀mlábas) should be similarly scanned.
ro87 ìllic |hớmŏ aūt | ; and perhaps 690 and 1003 (but see D. a. iii, c. ii).
(ii) when the disyllable bears no ictus: 903 quĕm $\breve{\text { eggo }}$ hơmìnēn; 1061 ừt ëlgŏ hờdije (probably common wordgroups).
(b) words which are normally iambi, but which, when ictus coincides with the natural accent on the first syllable, may be scanned as pyrrhics : as 740 tưaĕ $|\bar{u} x o b o r| i$. In Vergil's $u a ̆ \mid l e$, , uăl$\breve{e}$, | inquit accent alone has sufficed to shorten the final syllable of a word of very common use occurring in hiatus and lacking ictus.
C. Hiatus is of frequent occurrence at a metrical pause, especially in a long line such as the trochaic septenarius, where it was natural for an actor to take breath at the end of the first hemistich ; in the shorter iambic senarius such pause was less needed, and when hiatus occurs at the caesura it may usually be referred to another cause. ${ }^{1}$ Instances of either kind are:
(a) Hiatus at the diaeresis of a trochaic septenarius; very common, as in 399, 406, 435, 604 faéner|átṑ $\mid$ ápstu|lísti (perhaps partly due to the influence of the lost ablative-ending $-d$; cf. 796, 1028, and see E below), 667, 681, 778, 870, 923, 950, IoI3, IO9I, III2, \&c.; especially frequent when diaeresis coincides with a pause in sense or delivery: e.g. with change of speaker, as in $1_{5} 6,379,384,422,650,651,821,868,937$, 1075,1077 , 1094 ; with a strong pause or contrast in sense, as in $219,431,808,847$; with a pause before or after an interjection or parenthetic word, as in $673,696,851$; with anaphora as in 939-40; with a pause in a line delivered with comic solemnity, as in 859 .
(b) Hiatus at the caesura of an iambic senarius. It is almost ${ }^{1}$ It is obvious that when hiatus occurs at a metrical pause the unelided syllable never bears strong ictus. As regards its quantity, it is safest to take it as doubtful, unless the metrical pause coincides with a pause in sense or delivery, in which case the unelided syllable retains its full value.
certain that the caesura-pause alone cannot justify hiatus, though it may be an additional justification for a hiatus allowed on other grounds.
(i) Of instances of hiatus at the penthemimeral caesura in this play, those in 26 and 67 are doubtful, as occurring in the Prologue; that in 9I (ar|bitrá $\mid t \bar{u}$ ád $d \mid$ fatím) may primarily be due to the influence of the lost ablative-ending $-d$ (cf. 546 , 737 , and see E below) ; in 280 such hiatus coincides with change of speaker; in 546,882 between contrasted clauses; in $508,544,898$ with a strong pause in sense ; in 567 it follows an interjectional word. This leaves the instance in 89 , which is doubtful (see note ad loc., and also F below).
(ii) The instances of hiatus at the hepthemimeral caesura occurring in 720, 737, 739 probably mark sobs punctuating a passage delivered singultim ; see D (d) below.
(c) Hiatus is regularly permitted at the diaeresis of longer iambic lines (Septenarius and Octonarius) and of the Trochaic Octonarius : see Introd. 6. II. B. b, C. c, E. b.
D. Hiatus occurs frequently at a pause in delivery or sense : in the latter case the unelided syllable may retain its full metrical value. Such pauses must be objectively real, and not merely existent in the mind of the editor : they must fall under one of the following heads:
(a) before or after interjections and interjectional or parenthetic words and phrases : in this group the unelided syllable is shortened if long, unless the hiatus coincides with a strong pause. ${ }^{1}$ Instances are :
(i) after interjections ending in a vowel or diphthong, in 604 nể illam êcástor, cf. 614 ; 640 ờ hòminlet́m mailum; double

[^20]probably 47 I is to be scanned non hér|cté $\overline{\text { zैs }} \mid$ sum (without hiatus after $n i$ ).
(ii) before interjections beginning with a vowel or $h$-, and before interjectional phrases, as 497 quăm édêepol; 673, 696, at a strong pause before heús, occurring at diaeresis; 713 rogás $|m e ̄ ? ~ h o ̛ ́ m i n n| i s ~ i ́ m|p u d e ́ n| t e m ~ a u d a ́ \mid c i a ́ m!~(s e e ~ a l s o ~$ c. i and E below).
(iii) before or after vocatives, as 517 iưbŭ, | hòmo în|sanis-| sume, 1003 égŏ |, ěre, aû|dacis|sumét (or ego, ĕrlĕ, aûd-), 1004 mălŭ́m, Ĕp|idúminii; 432-3 Messeni|ô, āe|cede huc.
(iv) before or after parenthetic words, as 533 nón $\mid$ meminis $\mid$ tì ópsecro? 567 éc|cüm ōp|tumé| reuort|itur (hiatus at caesura); 85 I ăm|ábō, | ádser|ua ístunc (at diaeresis), cf. 405 iăm, ămà $\mid \bar{o} \hat{o}, d e-{ }^{2}$
(b) At change of speaker; here the unelided syllable may retain its full metrical value. Such hiatus is common, though elision is more usual (e.g. 640 &c.) : for instances see 147 (after $m e=m e d$, cf. 299, and E below), 380, 401, 547, 1003; it occurs when change of speaker coincides with caesura, as in 280 ; and is very frequent when change of speaker coincides with diaeresis, as in $156,379,384, & c$. (see list of instances in C. a above).
(c) At distinct pauses in sense, the unelided syllable retaining its full value : either
(i) where the pause is sufficient to justify a full-stop or colon, ${ }^{3}$ as in 188 (after legi $\mid \hat{o}$ ), 713 ${ }^{4}$ (after $m e=m e d$, cf. 737), ro3 8 ; occurring at diaeresis, as in $673,{ }^{4} 696,{ }^{4} 808$; or at caesura, as in 737,898 .
(ii) where a break occurs between two clauses of an

1 This is also an instance of B. (a).
2 This is also an instance of A. (b).
${ }^{3}$ Such hiatus is not infrequently allowed by Augustan poets; e.g. Verg. Aen. i. 16, 405.

antithesis ${ }^{1}$ (especially if there is chiasmus) ; as in $476,{ }^{2} 963$, rog8 (but see note ad loc.), 1123 ; occurring at diaeresis, as in $43 \mathrm{I}^{3}$; or at caesura, as in $544,546,{ }^{3} 882$.
(d) At a pause in delivery for some dramatic purpose; e.g. 188 cưm ùtrō |-hánc noc|tem si|es (introducing comic $\pi \alpha \rho a ̀$ à $\pi \rho \sigma \sigma$ סокíav); $508^{4}$ (to express assumed indignation); cf. 563 , which might be printed pallam ad phrygionem-cum coró|n̄̄-㪟|rius ${ }^{3}$; 784 (to mark dictatorial tone) ; $859^{5}$ (to mark comic 'frightfulness') ; 1088 numquam | uîdì |âlter'um (to emphasize surprise); 1125 , before égo sum Sosicles (either to give time for an embrace, or to emphasize the catastrophic disclosure) ; I 158 fûn $n d \hat{z}, \mid$ aêdes (in a list of separate items given in imitation of a praeco: but see note ad loc.). The series of hiatuses in 720, 737 (two), 739, 740 (two), probably marks sobs ; see C. b. ii above.
E. In some cases hiatus may be due, partly or entirely, to the influence on pronunciation of the lost ablative-ending $-d$.
(a) In the case of $m e$ and te the old pronunciation still lingered on in Plautus's time; accordingly hiatus frequently occurs after them in his plays, though chiefly at a break in metre or sense (many instances have been noted under $C$ and D) ; when hiatus follows them elsewhere, me, te are printed med, ted in the present text. The accusatives of these pronouns are by false analogy treated in the same way.
(b) Other instances are 91 (at caesura); 526 pón'dō ún|ciam (an old commercial phrase; see note ad loc.) ; 563 (see D. d above) ; $882^{4}$ lumbi $\mid$ sedénldō, ớcŭ li spec|tando $\mid$ dolent (see D. c. ii) ; 395 rítū | ástans; 495 homi|ni ignó|tō ín|sciens; 1115 a |fŭtrìā $\mid$ ăueblit; II51 nốstrā $\left\lvert\, \frac{1}{e x} x\right.$ sen|tenti|a. The last four instances are doubtful, especially 495 : see notes ad loc. Probably the influence of the lost $-d$ was not alone sufficient to justify hiatus,

[^21]except in the case of $m e$ and $t e$, and a few fixed legal and commercial phrases: it may, however, be an additional justification of an hiatus allowed on other grounds. It may here be remarked that, as will have been obvious, in a considerable proportion of the cases quoted under $\mathrm{C}, \mathrm{D}$, and E , several grounds combine to justify hiatus, as for instance in 431 iam séquár té; | hû̀nc uo|lo etiam | conlo|qui (pause with chiasmus, diaeresis, loss of $-d$ ), or in 546 immo cedo áps |té; égŏ $\mid$ post tibi $\mid$ reddam $\mid$ duplex (pause with chiasmus, caesura, loss of $-d$ ).
F. Some authorities state that hiatus was allowed by Plautus before certain common words beginning with $h$-, especially homo, hic, habeo and their inflexions. The true explanation of apparent instances of this rule is probably that such words frequently occurred in common word-groups wherein ordinary pronunciation allowed hiatus. An examination of instances in this play shows that most apparent cases of this rule can be referred to other causes: e.g. the instances in 374, 379, 473-4, 744 , fall under A. (a) ; that in 82 under A. (b) ; those in 903 , 106 I , under B. (a); that in 406 under C. (a) ; that in 89 (doubtful) under C. (b) ; those in 316, 640, under D. a. i; that in 713 under D. a. ii, D. c. i, and E. Of the cases term of abuse invariably thus pronounced; in 223 óctŏ| hớmìnū̀̂n may possibly reproduce popular pronunciation : but see note ad loc.
G. A few instances of hiatus occur, in the MSS. of this play, which cannot be referred to any of the above rules, and probably indicate corruptions in the text: namely in 13 (un-446 plus trilợintā $\mid$ ânnis, 525 (unmetrical), $55^{8}$ di $\mid$ mihht $\mid$ êx me|sciat, where hiatus would be possible only if mihi could here be scanned as a pyrrhic: see B. (a). In all these cases satisfactory, if not certain, emendations have been proposed:
see notes ad loc. It may be added that all cases of hiatus which Prof. Lindsay regards as doubtful are in the present text marked by a perpendicular line following the unelided syllable; but for many of these instances explanations have been attempted in the preceding sections. Possibly the non-consonantal pronunciation of final $-m$ was more general than is usually supposed.

8. Sources of the Text

The sources that we possess for the text of the Menaechmi are as follow :
(I) The codex Ambrosianus (A), a MS. of the fourth century A. D. written in capitals, now in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. It is unfortunately a palimpsest, the original text having been obliterated, and a part of the Vulgate superimposed thereon, by a too zealous monk of the seventh century. Cardinal Mai, who discovered the MS. early last century, partially recovered the original script by the aid of chemicals, which, however, subsequently caused parts of the MS. to rot away. Between philistine monk and scholarly prelate this valuable MS., once containing the whole of Plautus, has suffered so severely that about a third of it only now remains, and that very hard to decipher. Of this play nearly two-thirds is either missing or totally undecipherable, namely, ll. 1-56, 126-58, 303-42, 346-56, 374-445, 508-10, 595-1005, and 1066-1131. Of the remaining 470 odd verses about a quarter are fairly complete; the rest show either beginnings or ends (the central portions of the pages having suffered the most), or merely faint traces of letters or words.
(2) All other extant MSS. of Plautus (usually named the Palatine group, from their original home) are derived from a common archetype, which was a minuscule MS. of the eighth or ninth century. The readings of this MS., inferred from a consensus of the extant minuscule MSS., are designated by the symbol P . It is further conjectured that before the loss of the original P , two copies of it at least were made, from one of which extant minuscule MSS. derived eight plays, the remaining twelve being derived from the other. These supposed copies are referred to respectively by the symbols Pbd (source for the 'first eight' plays, i.e. Amph., Asin., Aul., Capt., Curc., Cas., Cist., Epid.), and Pbc (source for the remaining or 'last twelve' plays).

Of extant MSS. of the P group containing the Menaechmi, the chief are:
(a) Codex Vetus (B), a MS. of the tenth or early eleventh century, now in the Vatican Library at Rome. It contains all the plays, but there are clear indications ${ }^{1}$ that the last twelve plays are not derived from the same copy of $P$ as the first eight. Hence has been inferred the existence of $\mathrm{P}^{\mathrm{BD}}$ and $\mathrm{P}^{\text {bc, referred }}$ to above. This MS. was discovered in the sixteenth century by the German scholar Camerarius, and is the main source of Dur existing texts. Where, however, its authority clashes with that of $A$, preference is as a rule to be given to the readings of the latter on the score of its superior antiquity. Valuable corrections by several hands appear in $B$, the most important being those denoted by the symbol $\mathrm{B}^{2}$.
(b) Codex Ursinianus (D), now in the Vatican, a MS. of rather later date than the last. It resembles B fairly closely, that part of it which contains the last twelve plays being, it is conjectured, derived from a missing original ( PcD ) which, like the corresponding part of B , was a copy of Pbc .
(c) Codex Decurtatus (C), a MS. of the eleventh or early twelfth century, now at Heidelberg. Its readings closely resemble those of $\mathrm{D}, \mathrm{C}$ and D having probably been derived [^22]from a common original PCD, to which reference has been made above. C contains the last twelve plays only.

The subjoined stemma codicum will show the relationship to one another of the MSS. ${ }^{1}$ with which we are concerned :

The text and apparatus criticus of this edition are reprinted from Professor Lindsay's edition of Plautus in the Scriptorum Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis. In the app. crit. P denotes a consensus of all minuscule MSS. ( $\mathrm{B}, \mathrm{C}, \mathrm{D}$ ) ; PCD a consensus of C and D . The symbol codd. designates the highest possible authority, a consensus of A and P ; the symbol cod. denotes either $P$ (where $A$ is lacking) or $A$ (in the rare passages where $P$ is lacking). Thus, between 11. 595 and 1005 , where A is completely lacking, the symbol cod., which appears frequently in the app. crit., means that MSS. of the P group are the sole authority and are in agreement.

SYMBOLS

USED IN THE APPARATUS CRITICUS.

For symbols denoting MSS. ( $A, P$, codd., cod., $B, B^{2}, P C D, C, D$ ) see Introd. pp. 58-60.

Ital. $=$ Renaissance editors and interpolators. $e d d .=$ majority of previous editions.
$n . l .=$ not clearly decipherable.
Numbers given in brackets thus-(vii. 5)-refer to chapters and sections of Prof. Lindsay's Introduction to Latin Textual Emendation (Macm. I896).

Where readings of the palimpsest (A) are given in the App. Crit., the following signs are used: any given number of dots denotes an equal number of undecipherable letters; a dot placed beneath a letter means that the identification of that letter is not certain : a dash indicates an obliteration of the text so complete that even the approximate number of letters cannot be accurately discerned. Letters enclosed in brackets have been conjecturally restored by Prof. Lindsay.

In both the text and the App. Crit. a perpendicular line denotes a doubtful hiatus; words or letters within square brackets are probable interpolations; angular brackets enclose words or letters conjecturally supplied by some editor or commentator. Ictus-marks, where given, are printed for the sake of clearness only

NOTES

Argvmentym. Aulus Gellius (iii. 3. 1) mentions one Aurelius Opilius ( 84 B. C.) as the author of Plautine 'indices', which may be identified with the acrostic arguments extant in the Palatine group of MSS. for all the plays except the Bacchides. In any case the acrostic arguments are probably to be ascribed to the period of the revival of Plautine studies, 150-50 B.C. Non-acrostic arguments are also attached to five of the plays (Amph., Aul., Merc., Mil., Pseud.) ; they date from the second century A. D., and have been ascribed to a Carthaginian scholar who wrote metrical arguments to the books of the Aeneid and the plays of Terence.

1, 2. Mercator . . . ei . . . mors optigit : colloquial looseness of construction : cf. prol. 57-9 Epidamniensis ill' . . ei liberorum . . . nihil erat ; so also 311-15.

1. quoi: cf. aliquoi 623. This is the usual spelling in inscriptions of the late Republic and early Empire. Quintilian, who lived during the first century A. D., says (i. 7.27) that in his younger days the spelling $q u o i$ was the rule, but that later the practice arose of writing cui. The earliest form was quoiei; cf. 493 quoii. Scan quot erlant.
2. Surrupto: this Plautine form of the participle arises from confusion with the present, which was in O.Lat. written surripio or surrupio, unaccented $a ̆$ becoming before labials an indeterminate sound, written $i$ or $u$. The later form appears below in surrepticius (3, 7), for which Plautus writes surrupticius, Curc. 205 ; cf. Prol. 60, 68.

Hiatus at a caesura (as in this line and the next) is not as such permissible ; see Introd. 7. IV. C. b, p. 53.
4. Scan fắčt! Menaechmum; see Introd. 7. I. A. a. i, p. 42. e, 'after being', i. e. ' instead of '.
7. alitus: this form is found once in Livy, and perhaps is to be read in Cic. Planc. SI.
8. Menaechmum . . . ciuem : predicative. The hiatus is faulty.
9. eumque appellant, sc. Menaechmur, ; or perhaps $=$ ' accost him'.

Io. $I=$ ii. fratres : predicative.
Personae. Peniculus: this diminutive of penis ( $=$ cauda) , used as a common noun, significd, according to Festus, either a horse-tail whisk used for dusting fut iture (especially tables, cf. 78), and boots (cf. 391), or a long sponge ('loofah') used for a similar purpose. The point of its application to a parasite appears from 77 seq.

Menaechmus (M'́vaı $\chi \mu o s$ ) and Sosicles ( $\Sigma \omega \sigma \iota \kappa \lambda \bar{\eta} s$ ) are rather high-sounding names for two merchants. Menaechmus I and II correspond to Men. of Epidamnus and Men. of Syracuse respectively. In the first Folio of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors the corresponding characters (Antipholus of Ephesus and Ant. of Syracuse) are distinguished as Sereptus ( $=$ Surreptus) and Erotes or Errotes ( $=$ Erraticus).

Erotium : 'Eр́ஸ́tov, 'darling'; cf. Philematium (Most.), Philocomasium (Mil.), Philotizm (Ter. Hec. 81), &c. Such neuter diminutives are usual names for courtesans.

Cylindrus: Kú入ıvopos, 'rolling-pin'; a suitable name for a cook.

Messenio: M $\epsilon \sigma \sigma \eta \nu i \omega \nu$ : a slave was frequently named after the country of his origin ; cf. Cario, Dorio, Lydus, Syrus, Geta, \&c.

Scaena Epidamni : see on 32, 263-4.
Prologvs. In Roman Comedy, a Prologue, where there was one, served one or both of two purposes: (i) like the mapißacts of Old Greek Comedy it gave the poet an opportunity of answering his critics and of asking the audience's favourable attention: Terence's prologues, which are all genuine, are wholly of this kind; (2) like the opening speeches of Euripides' plays and the prologues of Middle and New Greek Comedy, it explains everything necessary for the understanding of the plot. The prologues attached to Plautus's plays are mainly of this kind; but it cannot with certainty be stated that any of the twelve regular prologues extant are genuine except those of the Aulularia, Rudens, and Trinummus. The Plautine prologues merely serve the purpose of a programme, and are spoken, not by one of the characters of a play, but by an extraneous character (e. g. the Lar Familiaris in Aulul.) or by a member of the grex specially dressed for the part (ornatu prologi); for the latter device cf. the Prologue in Shakespeare's Henry $V$.

Among the indications of the spuriousness of the present Prologue may be mentioned the large proportion of metrical difficulties ( $13,26,39,67, & c$. ) ; the frigid witticisms ( 3,49 ) ; the needless repetitions $(43,48)$; the contradiction between 11.6 and 15 ; and the abruptness of 1.7. Yossibly the Prologue is composed of three different fragments ( $1-6,7-16,17$-end) unskilfully patched together.

I, 2. salutem . . . propitiam . . . nuntio: either 'I give you auspicious greeting', or 'I wish you health and good luck'. For the expression cf. Trin. 837 pax propitia.
3. adporto: technical term for introducing a play; cf. Ter. Phorm. 24 adporto nouam Epidicazomenon. The weak joke which follows turns on the literal sense of adporto.

MENAECHMI

6. Brix ${ }^{5}$, who claims the prologue as genuine, explains the contradiction between this line and 15 by saying that this promise is made to secure the attention of the audience; when silence prevails, the speaker changes $h$ is tone and promises them good measure running over (14-16). This seems rather far-fetched.
7. See introduction to Prologue above. No satisfactory meaning can be assigned to atque here. A further indication that the Prologue is a piece of patchwork is the change in the speaker's attitude. From here onwards he seems to represent the author (cf. 10, 23, &c.), whereas in I-6 he represents the acting manager (cf. 3).
8. autumant )( factum dicitur 10 . To whom does this refer? Perhaps 7-12 are taken from some Greek comic prologue without regard to their pointlessness on a Roman stage.
9. quŏ itl|ud': see Introd. 7. IV. A. a. ii, p. 5 I.
illud $=$ argumentum, or perhaps the play generally.
10. nusquam dicam: sc. aliquid factum esse; ubi $=i b i u b i$. 'I shall not say that a thing happened anywhere but where I am informed it did happen.'
factum dicitur: i.e. by his imaginary informant ; cf. 22 and 46. Similar devices are common in our modern novels.
II. atque adeo: corrective ; see 21 note.
graecissat, ' has a Greek setting'. In a fragment of Poseidippos $\dot{i} \tau \tau \iota \kappa i \zeta \epsilon \tau \nu$ and $\dot{\epsilon} \lambda \lambda \eta \nu i \zeta \epsilon \epsilon \nu$ are opposed. $z$, which, like $y$, is not found in inscriptions before the end of the seventh century A.U.C., is usually represented in O.L. by ss ; cf. cyathissare (303), badisso, tarpessita ( $=\tau \rho a \pi \epsilon \zeta i \tau \eta s), \& c$.
11. sicilicissitat: comic prolongation into frequentative form. See Introd. 3.
12. antelogium: a hybrid word $=$ 'prelude, preface'. The hiatus before hoc is not admissible; see App. Crit. If Lindsay's suggestion is adopted, hoc fini is to be taken in the sense 'thus far'; cf. osse fini 859.

14, 15. 'I will give you (your allowance of) plot, measured not by the bushel,' &c. The speaiser assumes the rôle of a steward giving slaves their rations. Slaves on a farm received four modii of corn a month, free labourers, whose work was easier, three modii (cf. trimodio, 15). Perhaps there is a punning allusion to the phrase argentum metiri, to pay money by weight (wholesale).
demensum : depon. participle with pass. force : the neut. is used as a substantive $=$ ' allowance'. Cf. Stich. 60.
15. ipso horreo : cf. the phrase de dolio haurire. See also on 6 above.
16. Scan ädĕst; see Introd. 7. I. A. a. i, and cf. 17 füüt | Syrācusis (or $f \bar{u} t t$ ).

19, 20. mater . . quae mammam dabat: i. e. nutrix ) (mater quae pepererat. Sometimes mater alone is used in this sense, as Cist. 192: Verg. Aen. viii. 632 (of the wolf suckling the twins).
21. neque adeo, 'nor even'. adeo in Plautus means (1) 'in addition to that, furthermore', as here, 296 , and 596 ; or (2) 'up to that point or degree'.
22. Scan ūt quídem itlle, and cf. 336, 837 йta illa, 789, 958. See Introd. 7. I. C. a. For the appeal to imaginary evidence cf. 10 and Poen. 62 seq. propterea apud uos dico confidentius. Quia mih. pollictor dixit, &c.
23. The force of the final clause is '(I tell you this) ne... censeat,' sc. me illos uidisse. Scan ĕgo illốs; see Introd.7. I. C. b, and cf. 41 žta illưm, 46, 246, 535, &c.
24. postquam iam... sunt: the addition of iam makes the present the appropriate tense, as with ubi iam and quoniam $(=$ cum iam). Postquam is also found with historical present in the sense of 'after' when the main verb is in the same tense; cf. Capt. 24 postquam belligerant . . . capitur alter. See also on 34.
septuennes: cf. inif.
26. Hiatus at caesura doubtful ; Hermann proposes geminorum ; Onions, hunc alterum (confusion of -inum with hunc, and haplography ; cf. 276 note), to balance illum . . . alterum 28.
27. mercatum : probably local.
simul : redundant with secum; cf. 736.
28. illum . . . alterum : the use of illum here perhaps foreshadows its use in late Latin as an article, a use fully developed in its Romance derivatives (Fr. le, la, les, \&c.). But see 26 note. Scan äpüd $\mid$ matrem ; cf. 208, 795, 1034.
29. quom . . . uenit. For the present cf. II 36.
30. mortales multi : an expression also found in prose ; cf. Cic. Div. in Caecil. 25 ; Livy iii. 30. 8.
32. Epidamnus, originally a colony of Corcyra, afterwards became a Roman colony, when its name was changed to Dyrrhachium: for the reason see 263-4. It is now Durazzo, on the Illyrian coast opposite Brindisi.
33. Epidamnium is either a colloquial lengthening of the word, used metri gratia (cf. 12 sicilicissitat, and 1161 note), or conceals an original reading Epidamnum eum (Seyffert).
34. postquam . . . perdidit: usual tense after postquam in Plautus, who never uses the pluperfect; Terence does so, e.g. Andr. 177.
35. animum despondit : despondeo, meaning originally 'pledge, promise', acquires the signification 'give up, resign', and is used frequently by Plautus in this phrase with sense' lose courage, lose heart' ; so Livy iii. 38. 2 and elsewhere. Hence our 'despond'.
eaque.. . aegritudine $=$ eius rei aegritudine. Scan eaque by synizesis ; cf. 37 éar, $151 \overline{\text { eo }}, 428$ eadem.
37. The scansion Syrăcưsas (not found elsewhere) seems a further proof of non-Plautine origin. Brix, however, supports it by Merc. 846 amǔcitiam; Amph. 930 pudĭcitiam. See Introd.7.I. B. a.
38. surruptum : see on Arg. 2.
39. The scansion Táa $\mid$ renti (not found elsewhere) and the scansion Tărenn|ti with hiatus are both unsatisfactory.

40, 41. immutat . . .ita . . . dilexit: loose paratactic construction for ita dilexit ut immutauerit ; cf. 94-5, 102-3.
40. huic: disyllabic; Prologus is speaking as if he were in Syracuse ; cf. 49.
huic.. alteri $=$ illum alterum of 28 , i. e. Sosicles.
4I. illum ... alterum : the original Menaechmus (I), now of Epidamnus.
42. illius: Menaechmus. illi : Sosicles. The pronouns are very clumsily used.
nomen indit illi . . . Menaechmo: i.e. calls him Men. Menaechmum might also have been used; but cf. Io68. The phrase nomen indere is used frequently by Livy, e.g. xxi. 3I. 4 mediis campis Insulae nomen inditum.

45-6. Cf. Io and 22. illius and illum are to be taken as referring to the puer surruptus.
46. clamore ... flagitarier: i. e. 'cried' as missing by the public crier (praeco), who served the purpose of our advertisement columns and police notices. Edd. quote Petron. 92 iuuenis non minore clamoris indignatione Gitona flagitabat. Petron. 97 gives an actual notice of the sort ; the missing boy is described, and a reward offered for information. Brix suggests that there is a play on the other meaning of fagitarier. 'dunned by creditors'; but to take it thus necessitates referring illius and illum to the auos. The archaic passive infinitive form in -ier is fairly common in Plautus and Terence ; cf. 913, 1005.
uidi : used of senses other than sight ; cf. Verg. Aen. iv. 490 mugire uidebis Sub pedibus terram et descendere montibus ornos; Catull. Ixii. 9 canent quod uisere par est.
47. mox: when the actual play comes on. iam nunc: now already (but nuncĭam = 'at once, immediately'; cf. II 55).
48. This reiteration may be excused on the ground that it was necessary to impress upon the audience a fact without which the plot was unintelligible.
49. pedibus: in the double sense of 'feet' and 'feet in verse'; for a superior joke of the same kind cf. Shakespeare, As You Like It, iii. 2 : Ros. 'Some of them had in them more feet than the verses would bear. Cel. That's no matter : the feet might bear the verses. Ros. Aye, but the feet were lame,' &c.
50. examussim: this adverb is found in Plautus and Appuleius only. The amussis was a plank used probably like the modern plank and plumb-line.
disputem: ordinary meaning 'discuss pros and cons' not applicable here; perhaps used in sense 'make it clear on all sides'; cf. original meaning of puto ('to prune') and putus.
51. Epidamnum: the accusative is natural, as he must go to Epidamnus before he can transact anyone's business there. It is an accusative of motion used pregnantly with a verb of rest.
52. Scan uelît ; Plautus often retains the original long quantity of verb-inflexions in $-s,-t$, and $-o r$, when the syllable bears ictus. See Introd. 7. III. a, and cf. 759 aduentt, $921,956$.
53. ita ut det: limitative, 'but not forgetting to give me the wherewithal'.
54. egerit: the force of the tense here and in 55 is ' he will find he has been acting foolishly'; cf. 66I.
55. magi' maiores: for the double comparative cf. 978 magi' multo patior faciliu' uerba. For the whole of this passage cf. Poer. prol. 79-82. Teuffel regards 51-6 as an alternative passage to 4950. Perhaps there is here a punning reference to the sound of the name Epidamnum ( $\epsilon \pi i$ damnumn) ; cf. note on 263.
56. illuc . . . unde abii: a repetition (or alternative) of 49 : the Prologue returns in imagination to Epidamnus, where he remains till the end (uno asto in loco; cf. 72-6). The words are also figurative ; cf. Hor. Sat. i. I. 108.
59. ei : a monosyllable; cf. 6I $\overline{e q q} q u e, 874 \overline{e \overline{e z}}$.
ei . . . nihil erat by anacoluthon after Epidamniensis ill' 57. The carelessness of colloquial speech is imitated, cf. 64-5; Poen. 659 tu, sei to di amant, agere tuam rem occasiost; Shakespeare, Henry $V$, iv. 3. 35 : 'he which hath no stomach to this fight, Let him depart '.
nisi diuitiae : which he loved with a father's love.
60. surrupticium : see on Arg. 2.
62. heredem fecit: i. e. gave him his inheritance by dying (not 'made him his heir', that being implied in adoptat . . . sibi filium 60-1). Cf. Poen. 77, and see 477 note.
63. ut ibat, 'as he was going'. ut . . . pluerat,' when (after) it had been raining'. The quantity plūerat is justified by a passage in Varro (L. L. ix. 104), where he states that in his day correct pronunciation distinguished the perfect of words like pluo, luo, from the present by a lengthening of the $u$. The original form of the word was plouo (cf. Gk. $\pi \lambda \in \mathcal{F} \omega$ ) ; Priscian quotes perf. pluuit from Livy.

64,65. ingressus ... raptori : for the anacoluthon cf. 57-9.
raptori pueri $=$ ei qui puerum rapuerat; see note on 274 .
66. malam crucem : this phrase, like mala res, is regarded as a single word, and so can be qualified by an adjective. See also 328 note.
67. See App. Crit. and Introd. 7. IV. C. b, p. 53.
68. illic : at Epidamnus.
69. habet: simple verb for frequentative habitat; cf. Aul. 5 qui nunc hic habet, Trin. 193, 390, and our old-fashioned 'keeps'.
72. haec: pointing to the houses represented on the stage.
74. familiae : the households of the stage houses; explained by the lines following. There is also an allusion to the theatrical meaning of familia, troupe of actors (also grex).

75-6. The stock characters of a comoedia palliata; cf. a similar list Ter. Heaut. prol. 37-9. The first foot of 75 is a proceleusmatic. A line is missing from the end of the Prologue.
77. At the back of the stage stood the houses of Menaechmus I (L) and Erotium (R). Peniculus, as coming from the town, enters from the spectators' right and stands in front of Menaechmus's house. For the speech that follows cf. the speech of the parasite Ergasilus, Capt. 69 seq.

Peniculo: for the case cf. 43, 1068 ; Capt. 69.
78. quia ... detergeo: cf. our phrase 'make a clean sweep of everything on the table '. The Romans did not use tablecloths, but after a meal the tables were wiped with a gausape: cf. Hor. Sat. ii. 8. Io puer alte cinctus acernam Gausape purpureo mensam pertersit. The peniculus also (see Personae: note on Peniculus) was used for wiping furniture.
79. captiuos: prisoners of war )( serui, slaves born to that condition.
catenis: chains by which they were fastened to a wall)(compedes, fetters fastening the feet together, but allowing some freedom of movement. Cf. 84-5.
81. nimi' simply = 'very', as usually in Plautus and Terence; cf. 94, 696 ; Aul. 208 nimi' male timui. Scan $m \overrightarrow{e a}$ by synizesis; cf. 200 meo.
82. Scan năm hờmıัni ; see Introd. 7. IV. A. b. ii, and cf. 98, 292, 675.
ad malum . . . malum: chains on the top of captivity.
85. tum, 'moreover'; the compediti are a different class from the catenath, cf. 79-80.
anum : iron rings surrounded the victim's legs, which were fastened together by a chain or rod connecting the rings. Two MSS. read compediti ianum (the rest compediti anum with faulty hiatus); hence present reading. Havet had already proposed ii amum.
86. clauom : the rivet fastening together the ends of an iron bar bent into a ring for use as a fetter (cf. last note).
eae: pronominal subject attracted to gender of complement; 'this (way of treating slaves)'.
87. uoles: generalizing future.
88. esca . . . uinciri: cf. our expression 'tethered by the tooth '.
89. Scan ăpŭd ménsam; see Introd. 7. I. B. b. i. There is doubtful hiatus at the caesura; see App. Crit. deliges: jussive; cf. Amph. 928 reddas meas (res).
90. edit: cf. 249 ; this and other subjunctives in -im were originally optatives (e. g. sim $=\dot{\epsilon} \sigma i \eta \nu)$.

COMMENTARY: LINES 74-102

91. The hiatus at the caesura is perhaps admissible if we allow for the original ablative termination in $-d$. But see App. Crit.
ad fatim used thus adverbially implies the existence of a nom. fatis (satietas); it is also used as an indeclinable substantive, adfatim ( $=$ satus), cf. 457 ; Mil. 980 tibi diuitiarum adfatimst.
92. numquam . . . fugiet: for the sentiment cf. Hor. Sat. i. 5.67 rogabat Denique cur umquam fugisset, cui satis una Farris libra foret.
capital = facinus capitale. There should be a heavy stop either at fecerit, or (better) at fugiet.
93. dum =quamdiu. Scan dŭm ĕo; see Introd. 7. IV. A. b. i and cf. 413 nйm ̌̌staec, 449 düm hieto.
94. Scan ǐta ĭstaéc ; see Introd. 7. I. C. b, and cf. 265, 335, 528, &c. lenta, 'elastic'; cf. next line.
95. extendas : this use of 2 pers. sing. of subjunctive in general statements is found elsewhere in Plautus, as well as in later writers; cf. Bacch. 63 ubi periclum facias aculeata sunt. The mood corresponds to Gk. indefinite subj. with $\stackrel{a}{a} \nu$. See also notes on 103, 502.
96. nam introduces the particular application of his remarks.
quo: adverb of place substituted for personal relative : so unde? for a quo ? 783. As an alternative, eo in this line may be taken as adverb, and $e 0$ in 97 as main verb of 96-7.
97. iudicatus: an insolvent debtor was handed over by the praetor to his creditor, who kept him in his house in a state of semi-slavery. In this case Peniculus has adjudged himself to Menaechmus; he goes willingly and hugs his chains (i.e. uincla escaria). Cf. Asin. 937 iudicatum me uxor abducit domum.
98. alit... educat: Nonius distinguishes thus: alere est uictu temporali sustentare, educareautem ad satietatem perpetuam educere. Cf. 905.
99. facit, ' practises'.
100. ita est =huiusmodi est: colloquial use of adverb with esse; cf. 258 , and see note on 485 .
ipsus: this form, relatively to $i \not p s e$, is more frequent in Plautus than in Terence. Both ipse and ipsus are composed of the demonstrative is strengthened by the particle -pe (seen in quippe), and the pronoun-stem so-, which appears in the one case as -sĕ ( $=-$ sŏ ), and in the other as -sus $(=-s o s)$, these suffixes corresponding in form to the Gk. $\delta$ and ös respectively.
escae maxumae : descriptive genitive qualifying ipsus ; ' himself a hearty eater'; cf. Hor. Od. i. 36. 13 multi Damalis meri.
101. Cerialis, 'worthy of Ceres' festival'. The Cerialia took place in the Circus and lasted from the 12th to the 19th of April ; the celebrations included heavy banquets.
102. struices . . . patinarias: probably pyramids of various dishes arranged on stands. Cf. Massinger, City Madam, ii. I: 'The dishes were ranged one upon another As woodmongers do billets.'
103. standumst: usually a guest could help himself without rising from the lectus.
petas: for this mood, parallel to Gk . subjunctive with $\epsilon^{\prime} \dot{a} v$, cf. 95, and see Sonnenschein's Rudens, note on 1021. Tr. 'should you seek'.
104. iam . . . multos: cf. Asin. 428 triduom hoc unumn; Rutd. 137, &c., and our colloquial, 'I haven't been there these three days'.
105. domi domitus sum: this, the MSS. reading, is taken to mean, 'I've been living the domestic life at home', domitus being regarded as a comic fourth-conjugation form such as we find in Mil. 34 ne dentes dentiant. On the analogy, however, of Capt. 84 ruri rurant, and of a deponent form ruror quoted by Nonius from Varro, Lindsay suggests that a first-conjugation deponent form, domatus, should perhaps be read here: a copyist would be likely to change it to the more familiar-looking domitus. Vahlen suggests dominatuts sum, 'I have been playing the host'.
cum careis meis would naturally mean 'with my dear ones' (i. e. children, &c.) ; but Peniculus explains his use of the phrase in the next line.
106. To him everything he has to pay for out of his own pocket is dear; cf. Aul. 374-6, where the miser Euclio complains of the dearness of provisions.

Io7. id quoque iam, 'then there's this further trouble'; id stands in anticipatory apposition to the whole sentence; so with other neuter pronouns, e. g. istuc (' by the by') 536 ; this is the real construction of utrum used as a disjunctive interrogative particle.
instruontur: his dainty dishes are drawn up like a regiment; the table is the parasite's battlefield. The metaphor is continued in deserunt. Cf. Capt. 158-64, where various dishes are compared to various kinds of troops.
109. Menaechmum : thus the character is introduced to the audience ; cf. 180, 218, &c.
eccum stands for ecce + hum (i. e. hunc without the demonstrative suffix -ce) ; for the construction see on I79-80.
ino seq. Menaechmus's wife follows him to the door to see where he is going, but is soon (127) driven indoors by his abuse. For the metres $110-34$ see Schema Metrorum, p. 213 ; and on the metres of Cantica generally see Introd. 6. II. F, p. 33.

IIo. sies: this form of the subjunctive was originally an optative (esies $=\epsilon i ̋ \eta s, \& c$.). The influence of the forms simus, sitis $\left(=\epsilon_{i}^{i} \mu \epsilon \nu\right.$, єitc), led to the gradual disappearance of the $e$ in siem, -es, -et, -ent. See Lindsay's Captizi, 193 note.
inposque animi, 'unable to control your feelings'; like conpos, inpos is followed by the genitive of respect. Cf. the late use of inpotens.
III. esse odio supplies the passive, as odio habere the present active, of odisse.

COMMENTARY: LINES 103-24

uideas: subj. by attraction to the mood of habeas; see 556 note. 113. faxis, faxo: this 'future-perfect' form was originally an S-Aorist Subjunctive. While Plautus uses fecero absolutely, he uses faxo usually with another verb following, either syntactically in the subjunctive with $u t$ or (as here and 539-40, 644) alone, or paratactically in the future indicative, as 326 madebunt faxo. It has the sense ' I'll see to it that' or 'I'll warrant that '. Scan fáa $x$ ťs fāx $\mid o$.

116. quid feram, 'what I'm bringing in'; this and the next question she asks on his return.
117. portitorem: a portitor combined the functions of a customhouse officer and a modern immigrant official ; like Men.'s wife, he pried into everything and asked too many questions. For the metaphor cf. Asin. 159, 241 ; Cic. ad Att. ii. 16. 4.

II 9 . In this trochaic line the first foot is a proceleusmatic, the second an anapaest.
nimium . . . delicatam, 'I have spoilt you'.
ut facturus, sc. sum, 'how I'm going to act' : sum (est, \&c.) is sometimes omitted in tenses where it is an auxiliary; cf. $A \sin .271$ hanc quidem quam nactus praedam; Amph.964. In Plautus the indicative is frequently found in an indirect question-clause; cf. 207 note, and see Lindsay, Syntax of Plautus, p. 66.

I21. lanam: for making clothes. As in the mediaeval English family, all clothes were made at home.
aurum: trinkets.
uestem : curtains, rugs, coverlets.
purpuram : for trimmings.
quicquam : probably adverbial.
122. malo: caueo is used also with $a b$ and ablative, 151, and with accusative of neuter pronoun, $265,786$.
si sapis: used often with fut. or imperative in the apodosis : sometimes si sapies is found, e.g. Rud. I391. For the sentiment

129. pugnaui refers to his theft of the palla as well as to his verbal victory.

I30. hanc ... pallam: cf. Asin. 885. He lifts a corner of his pallium and shows that he is wearing his wife's palla underneath it. The palla was the ordinary out-door garment ('mantle') of a Roman lady: the pallium was worn by actors representing men in a comoedia palliata. Cf. 658.
131. sic, 'as I have done'.
132. fabre, 'in a workmanlike manner', i. e. 'it's a masterpiece': cf. Cas. 861 haec (fallacia) est fabre facta ab nobis.
133. meo malo: because he originally paid for it. It is lepidum, $& c$. , to throw away money.
damnum : i.e. Erotium ; cf. 137, where he calls Peniculus his Commoditas; so Curc. 678 sed eccum lenonem, incedit, thensaurum meum. deferetur: this verb is often used of gifts to a mistress; so too degero. Cf. 173, 508 note.
134. nostrum . . . socium : genitive; cf. Pseud. 678 doctum hominum. salute: modal abl., as Rud. 910: with cum in Merc. 811 (rediit) cum quidem salute familiai maxuma.
136. insidias . . praesidium : continuing the military metaphor of 134-5. For the pun cf. I91 induuiae . . . exumiae.
137. mea Commoditas, &c.: i.e. qui commode et opportune aduenis; tr. 'My Suitability, my Seasonableness'. A fashionable and affected mode of speech, similar to that practised by the Euphuists of Elizabeth's day; e.g. Piercy Shafton in Scott's Monastery, c. xv: 'Be henceforth named, for example, my Protection, and let me be your Affability.'
138. quid agis? mode of salutation, cf. Hor. Sat. i. 9. 4 quid agis, dulcissime rerum? Pen. takes the question literally; cf. Most. 719 SI. quid agis? TR. hominem optumum teneo.

141. facinus luculentum : Men. means himself dressed in the palla, but Pen.'s mind is running on culinary matters, of which he professes (142) to be a connoisseur.
142. reliquias: i.e. of the supposed dish.
143. enumquam ( $=e n+u m q u a m)$ : used by Plautus and Terence to introduce a rhetorical question; cf. 925.
144. ubi . . raperet: subj. shows that no particular picture was meant. For this generalizing subjunctive in a relative clause cf. Rud. 313-15 ecquem . . . uidistis . . . qui duceret, ibid. 320.

Catameitum: this was the form into which Ganymedes was corrupted in popular Latin speech; so Adoneus for Adonis: for similar corruptions of Greek names cf. Proserpina for Persephone, alcedo for alcyon, &c. Later catameitus becomes a common noun $=$ an effeminate or depraved person; cf. Cic. Phil. ii. 31. 77.

Phorm. 210 quid si adsimulo? satinest? and for similiter redundant cf. Phaedr. v. 5. 34 scurram multo similius imitatum. Men. spreads out his pallium like an eagle's wings and displays the effeminate garb beneath.

15I. aps te caueo: cf. Pers. 316 caue sis a cornu; for other constructions of caueo see i22 note.
caueo cautius: probably a popular turn of expression like propere properare, &c.
152. With the reading in the text this line is to be taken as a continuation of Men.'s perge, (perge), i 50 . He is going to say 'Come along, do (to a place where we may celebrate a wake over the departed day)', but the Parasite, thinking that by perge he means 'Go on praising me', interrupts him, $150-1$. The scansion ăt|que huinc (on which see Introd. p. 31, note 3, and 7. I. B. b. i) is doubtful ; but this arrangement gives better force than to regard the line as independent of perge, 150, and to read with Onions habemus, hunc, or with Vahien clam uxorem est ubī sepulcrum haberm átque hunc comburam diem (which throws a faulty emphasis on atque). See App. Crit. The metaphor is from a corpse about to be laid on the pyre and interred (the cena being taken in the evening, when the day was dead) ; it is continued in 153 incendo rogum and 154 ad umbilicum ... mortuos; perhaps there is a reference to the nouendialis cena, or 'funeral baked meats'. Cf. too the opening of Gray's Elegy. Havet, who agrees with Ussing in regarding sepulchrum as a corruption due to the words following, proposes to read clam uxorem ubi sit pulchre habemus quî hunc c.d.; 'we have the means of celebrating the day's wake where we can enjoy ourselves,' &c. An objection to this is that the order is confused.

153. aequom oras: possibly 'that's a reasonable request', in reference to perge, 150 ; more probably the meaning is, as usually in Plautus, 'what you say is reasonable '; cf. Most. 582 ; Pers. 587.
incendo: the pres. indic. 'deliberative' is usual after quam mox in colloquial Latin; cf. Bacch. 775, ATil. 1406 quam mox seco? and, in English, phrases like 'How soon do we start?'

154-5. ad umbilicum . . . mortuos: i. e. it is already afternoon. The use of umbilicus (as of o $\mu \phi$ a $\lambda$ is in Gk.) is common in the sense of 'middle'; it is imitated by Milton, Comus 520: 'Within the navel of this hideous wood.' Havet, regarding the transference of this meaning of umbilicus from the sphere of space to that of time as impossible (though a similar confusion occurs below, 177, by way of a joke), suggests that here, as in Pliny, N.H.vi, § 212 , the word refers to the gnomon of a sundial. He shows that the first correctly orientated sundial easily accessible to the public of Rome was one which was set up by Q. Marcius Philippus in 164 B.C., twenty years after Plautus's death, and which aroused great popular interest (cf. Pliny, N.H. vii, §§213-14). He conjectures that this line is a topical 'gag' introduced by some actor or magister gregis during a performance of the play at this date, and that the meaning is 'The day's half-gone already by the (new) sundial'. This is ingenious, but far-fetched; nor does it account for the combination ad umbilicum ... mortuos. A more probable explanation is that the expression is a metaphor from that kind of death in which cessation of vitality proceeds from the feet upwards; cf. Plato, Quickly's description of Falstaff's death (Henry V, in. iii. 26) : 'Then I felt to his knees, and so upward and upward, and all was as cold as any stone.'

I56. Note the hiatus at change of speakers, here coinciding with the diaeresis, as frequently, e.g. 379, 384, 650, 868, 937: 1075, 1077, 1094.

COMMENTARY: LINES 152-68

per solum: probably 'through the sole of my foot'; cf. Poen. 57 I at edepol nos tibi in lumbos linguam atque aculos in solum, a retort to the wish deciderint femina uobis in talos uelim. Edd. who prefer the rendering 'through its socket' compare Stat. Theb. i. 55 manibusque cruentis Pulsat inane solum, where, however, solum is now generally taken as $=$ 'the ground'.
158. licet gives assent to a request ; cf. 213, 224, and Rud. 121226, where it occurs in this sense fifteen times in succession.

I59. leonino cauo: cf. Ter. Phorm. 744 conclusam hic habeo uxorem saenam.
160. eŭ́ edepol : eu in conjunction with edepol, hercle, ecastor, \&c. (not to be confused with eu! = Gk. $\in \dot{v}$, cf. 174, 176), expresses surprise or indignation, and at the same time introduces an assertion; cf. 316,908 . For hiatus after interjections cf. $316,640,872$.
ne : here an affirmative particle ( $=\mathrm{Gk} . \nu \mathrm{\nu ai}$ ) ; see 604 note.
esses: potential; either 'you would (now) be . . .' (sc. si agitator esses), cf. Cas. 811 ; or, ' you would have made...', imperf. for pluperf. as in Mil. 28-30.
agitator: in the chariot-races at the ludi Circenses a driver frequently looked behind him to see whether the next man was pressing him.
161. quidum? -dum strengthens the interrogative adverb; cf. its use as an enclitic attached to imperatives, e. g. agedum, tacedum, cedodum ; cf. $265,348,386$. For qui (adverbial ablative) interrogative cf. 396, (indirect) 337 ; exclamatory, 428, 451.
162. quid ais? 'look here', a formula used to draw attention to a new point, cf. 914 ; so audin 310 . Peniculus takes the question literally ; cf. 138 .
enim, 'indeed', 'truly'; here, as usually in Plautus and Terence, an asseverative particle, $=$ classical enimuero; cf. Aul. 500 ; Most. 551, &c.
aio... nego,'say Yes and No to'; cf. 634, and Ter. Eun. 252 , where the parasite Gnatho says negat quis: nego; ait: aio. Nego, though assimilated to the first conjugation, is probably nec + aio.

164-5. Niemeyer fills the lacuna thus: facere coniecturam (tecum? PE. Eloquar recte tibi Cocti quid sit quasi coquorumb captum sit collegium; 'I'll tell you of what sort the dish is just as correctly as if you had called in a whole Board of Cookery.' This is not justified by the traces in A (see App. Crit.), but makes good sense; de odore would naturally suggest cooking to Pen.
165. captum: probably used here as in the phrase iunicem (arbitrum) capere.

I66. quid olet? Ussing connects these words paratactically with odorare.
apstines? either transitive (sc. nasum), or intr. (sc. odorari).
168. nasum: archaic form of nasus, common in Plautus, e.g.

MENAECHMI

Amph. 444. There is considerable confusion in Latin between masc. and neut. $o$-stems; as a rule the neuter gender is confined to things without life, but names of parts of the body fluctuate between masc. and neut. ; in popular speech, as reflected by Plautus, dorsus, collus, tergus ( m .) appear for the corresponding classical neuter forms. Generally speaking, in vulgar and late Latin the masculine tends to oust the neuter in o-stems.
inlutili: the last part of the word is connected with the supine-stem of lazo.
169. lepide ut fastidis, 'how divertingly you turn up your nose' ; the phrase $=$ lepidum (est) ut f., the adjective being attracted by the adverb $u t$; cf. such Gk. phrases as $\theta a v \mu a \sigma i \omega s$ is, and Mil. 763 bonu' bene ut malos descripsit mores.
decet, sc. fastidire; 'naturally'; explained by furtum, &c., 170.
170. furtum, scortum: a jingle, scortum being pronounced scurtum ; cf. Pseud. 791 furinum est forum; Truc. 773 cura cor. Before liquids and nasals there was a tendency to pronounce $o$ as $u$, especially in popular speech ; Priscian (i. 26. 35 H) remarks that in rustic speech fontes, frondes were pronounced funtes, frundes; so Gk. кó̈opvos, rópvos become in Latin cothurnus, turnus.

171-2. These lines are both assigned to Men. by Niemeyer, who completes them thus: tibi fuan $\langle t$ quiaequ(omque me uis: ita edepol recte omnia Elocutu's. nam $\langle a b$ uxore pallam surrupui mea $\rangle$. Certainly some line similar to the latter is needed to explain furtum, just as 173, 174, explain respectively scortum and prandium.
173. hanc: he points to Erotium's house (r.).
174. eu! here simply $=$ Greek $\epsilon \overline{\mathrm{v}}$, ' bravo!', as in 176, if read there extric metrum: for the ordinary Plautine meaning see note on 160 , and cf. Epid. 72 eu edepol res turbulentas.
175. inde: i.e. from the end of the prandium.
diurnam stellam: Lucifer, ф $\omega \sigma \phi$ ópos, the morning star ( $=$ Hesperus, the evening star).
176. expedite, 'plainly'.
ferio: colloquial use of pres. indic. for deliberative subj. with iam in questions; cf. Mil. Glor. 1400 iamne ego in hominem inuolo? So with quam mox; cf. 153 .
177. uel mane etiam, 'or rather wait a bit yet'.
mille passum: mille is always a substantive in Plautus; passum $=$ passuum. 'You've delayed the flagon by a mile,' i. e. it would have been a mile nearer if you had not said 'mane'. Cf. Truc. 334 tute tibi mille passum peperisti morae.
178. Samiae: i.e. fragile like earthenware. Samian ware was the commonest crockery used at Rome ; cf. Stich. 694 ; Cic. pro Mur. 36, 75.

ing of the final syllable of máne see Introd. 7. I. A. a. ii, and cf. 225 rédǔ, 416 túcĕ, 517 iừbé.
eccam: for the formation of this word see 109 note. Eccum, -am, eccillum, -am, can, as here, be placed parenthetically in a sentence without affecting the construction; cf. 219, 567, 772, Bacch. 6ıi Mnesilochus eccum maestus progreditur. foras. When a noun without a verb follows one of these words, it is normally put into the accusative; cf. 565,898 ; Mil. Glor. 1216 eccum praesto militem.

179-81. solem uides satin ut occaecatust: uides is Leo's correction of MSS. uideo. For the late position of the interrogative particle cf. Curc. I8 et heri cenauistine? Solem, logically the subject of the dependent clause, becomes grammatically the object of the main (cf. Greek oỉ $\delta \dot{a} \sigma \epsilon$ ס̃ $\sigma \iota \iota \in(\vec{i})$; this 'anticipatory' construction is common in Plautus, cf. 246, 1083. Thus the sentence $=$ nonne wides ut (' how') sol occaecatust . . .? For the indic. in a dependent interrogative clause cf. 207. Acidalius's suggestion solem uide-satin ut occaecatust . . .? can be paralleled by Stich. 270-1 hoc uide, Satin ut facete, atque ex pictura astitit? where satin ut ( $=$ satin est ut) has the force of a very surprised nonne; cf. Mil. II 34 satine ut Commoditas usquequaque me adiunat! So satin alone frequently stands for nonne or -ne; 522, Mil. 481 satin abiit ille?
181. huius in the text should be written huizus to indicate scansion: see page 47, note 2 .
182. extra numerum es, 'you don't count'; lit. 'you're not reckoned in' ; she means that he is not worth noticing, or that he is de trop; but he contrives to turn it into a compliment 183. In military language extra numerum $=$ not assigned to any definite position ; cf. Verg. Aen. vi. 545 explebo numerum.
183. adscriptiuis... ad legionem : explains aliis. These were unarmed reserves, who took the place and arms of armed legionaries that fell in a battle. They were, of course, picked troops. Pen. answers Erotium's sneer by saying: 'That's also the case of the picked reserves attached to a legion.' There is a hint, too, that he is ready to take Men.'s place with Erotium if Men. is rendered hors de combat (by the bottle). Niemeyer (Brix ${ }^{5}$ ), completely misunderstanding the force of Pen.'s remark, and imagining that he is protesting against being considered an adscriptiuus, gives 183-8 to Pen., and alters 188 (embodying a correction of Schöll) to tuae legioni adiudicato, ut cum uiro (Schöll: eo) hanc noctem. sies. Scan ùdem üstuc ; cf. I 84 égo ïstic, 375 eggo istaēc, 622 mǐhi üstūc, 651, 782, &c.

184-5. istic $=$ apud te : for redundancy cf. Cas. 546 isti apud uos. iussi: there is no need to adopt Acidalius's correction iussim ; we may suppose that the question had been mooted before. There is no inconsistency with 174; the proelium is a drinking-match, different from the prandium, which is not mentioned till 208. At the same time proelium is put $\pi a \rho$ à $\pi \rho o \sigma \delta o \kappa i a \nu ~ f o r ~ p r a n d i u m ; ~ c f . ~$ potabimus, cantharo, and hanc noctem sies in the next three lines.

187. For uter, relative, cf. 1085 ; Aul. 327.
cantharo : abl. of instrument.
188. Scan tuct est by synizesis; there is hiatus at both pauses; cf. Introd. 7. IV. D. c, d. For cứm ütro see Introd. 7. IV. A. b. i.
tua est legio, 'he is your regular force'; Men., who is confident of victory, does not hanker after the barren glory of an adscriptiuus.
cum utro: i.e. with the legio or the adscriptiuus. For another reading and interpretation see on 183 .
190. interim $=$ 'meanwhile', i.e. 'yet all the same', as Fr. cependant. Erotium catches sight of the palla. Niemeyer gives this line to Pen., explaining that he purposely pulls aside Men.'s pallium to prejudice him with Erotium.
nequis quin = fucere non potes quin. The connexion is ' yet you're so fond of her that you must needs', &.c.
aliquid: for the acc. cf. 512, 514-15.
191. induuiae: a word invented to contrast with exuuiae; for the style of joke cf. 136 .
rosa: cf. Asin. 664 mea rosa, mi anime.
192. superas ... ut : so in prose uincere ut ; tr. ' you easily obtain a higher place on my list'.
quisquam qui impetrant: i. e. any of her other visitors. For plural verb with singular indefinite pronoun cf. Pers. 55-6 numquam quisquam...fuit quin parasitando pauerint wentris suos; Epid. 399 exite huc aliquis. See also Quintil. ix. 3.
193. tantisper . . . dum, 'only so long as'. This line and the next are spoken aside.

194-5. si amabas: the indicative is emphatic; 'if you really loved him'. In form the clause is an open condition in the past; cf. similar clauses with jussive subj. in apodosis, Pseud. 286, Truc. 748.
oportebat ... abreptum, sc. esse: cf. 995; Aul. 754 non attactam oportuit; Ter. Ad. 214 morem gestum oportuit. This omission is invariable in Terence, and usual in Platus. Scan $i a ̆ m$ öfōrt|ehat; cf. iăm ego, Sc8. For general sense of this line cf. Pseud. 286 si amabas, inuenires mutuon (=inuenire oportebat; cf. 611 comesses).
mordicus : i. e. with kisses ; cf. Catull. viii. 18 quem basiabis? cui labella mordebis?
196. hoc: the pallium, which he has now taken off preparatory to divesting himself of the palla.
facere: here used in religious sense, 'offer (in sacrifice)', like Greek $\rho^{\prime} \in \zeta \epsilon \epsilon$. Men. compares himself to a victorious general who, in accordance with a vow, dedicates a choice portion of his spoil (exuиiae) to a deity.
197. cếdð, 'give (it) here'; cedo is an imperative of do as originally conjugated, with the demonstrative particle -ce (cf. hunc = hum-ce, ecce, &c.) prefixed. Cf. 265,544 . The plural is found in the contracted form cette.
sic, 'just as you are', (cf. 351) explained by cum palla; Men. still had it on. Yeniculus is reminded by his patron's appearance of effeminate stage dances, which were performed in the palla; cf. 513.
198. saltabo? the future indicative is used to echo Pen.'s salta because (1) the imperative has no first person, (2) all imperatives refer to the future.
sanus . . . non es: cf. Cicero's delightfully pompous Nemo fere saltat sohrius nisi forte insanit (pro Mur. 6). Undignified conduct was all but criminal in the eyes of a Roman.
an tu magis? sc. insanis; hinting at his extravagance.
197. saltas: present, as we say 'if you're not (for) dancing'.
200. ab Hippolyta: the queen of the Amazons, whose tamous girdle was coveted by Admete, daughter of Eurystheus. Hercules was ordered to procure this girdle as his sixth (or ninth) labour; cf. Epid. 179.
haud : most edd. transfer this word to the next line, reading Hercules haud aeque, to avoid hiatus after umquam; needlessly, as hiatus is possible at diaeresis.

200-I. haud.. . umquam: emphatic negative ; cf. 533. Schöll assigns meo... periculo to Pen. (a parasite's flattery); but this makes 202 rather abrupt.
202. una uiuis: stronger than es; 'you're the only girl alive who', &c. For indic. with quando, causal, cf. 422.
morigera moribus: colloquial figure ; cf. animo . . animatos, 203. Scan mès.
203. hoc animo: i. e. this yielding disposition.
decēt: original length of final syllable retained owing to ictus; cf. 52 uelît, &c.
204. qui ... properent : sneeringly, 'yes, such as . . $\therefore$ This line and 206 are asides.
205. minis: the Attic (silver) mina $=100$ drachmae, about £3 15 s. anno: here 'a year ago'; cf. Amph. 91.
206. ut ratio redditur, ' on your own showing', lit., 'according as the account (i. e. of profit and loss) is given (by you)'.
207. quid uolo: indirect questions in Plautus are as often paratactic (with indic.) as syntactic (with subj.) ; cf. 181, 349, 425, 677,685 . Sometimes the two moods appear together, as $A m p h .17$ nunc quoius izessu uenio et quam ob rem uenerim dicam.
scio: she has a general idea of what he wants; see on 184-5.
209. scitamentorum, 'dainties'; from scitus (partic. of scisco)

in its secondary meaning of 'fine, delicate'. Niemeyer gives 11. 209-12 to Peniculus, as proceeding more naturally from him; but cf. Ioo ipsus escae maxumae.
210. glandionidam . . . pernonidam: these comic patronymics, formed respectively from glandium (kernel of pork, i. e. a tasty bit from the neck) and perna (ham), are in apposition to the nouns suillam (pork; cf. agnina, sc. caro) and laridum (fat bacon). 'Pork from Braunston, bacon from Hampton' is a rough equivalent. For this obsolete form of jest cf. Pers. 702-5 (a list of names ending Quodsemelarripides Numquameripides) ; common in Aristophanes, о то́лєноs, $\sigma \tau \rho а т \omega \nu і$ íns.
211. sincipitamenta: a by-form of sinciput ( = semicaput), here 'pig's cheek'. Warner translates freely here, giving the equivalent Elizabethan dainties: 'Some oysters, a mary-bone pie or two, some artichockes, and potato rootes.'
212. madida: i. e. elixa, 'boiled'; cf. 326 madebunt faxo.
miluinam, sc. famem; the kite was a type of voracity; cf. Aul. 316 ; Rud. I124, and the old Eng. saying 'As hungry as a gled'.
213. ecastor: a woman's oath, as mehercle was a man's, according to Gellius, xi. 6; cf. $372,424,614,734$.
214. iam of the immediate future, as $142,174,225$.
216. sequere tu: addressed to Peniculus. Hiatus at change of speaker ; cf. 380, 401.
217. hodie does not merely strengthen the negative (as it does e.g. Trin. 971), but is to be taken with perdam in the sense 'to-day of all days'.
ut te perdam: lit. 'on condition of losing you'; ut = Greek lose you for all the riches of heaven.' Cf. Ter. Phorm. 165-6 ut mi liceat tam diu quod amo frui Iam depecisci morte cupio. At the end of this line excunt Pen. and Men.
218. euocate : addressed to slaves in attendance. intus, 'from within'.
Culindrum . . . coquom : from 275 uae tergo meo it is evident that Cylindrus is a slave; for the bearing of this fact on the authorship of the original see Introd. 3, pp. 13-14. Erotium evidently belonged to the upper crust of the demimonde.
219. The hiatus is justified by the break in the sense occurring in conjunction with the diaeresis. See Introd. 7. IV. D. c. i, p. 55.
nummos: in the absence of a qualifying adjective (e.g. aureus), nummus in Plautus usually means a didrachmon or twodrachma piece (about Is. 6 c. ) ; cf. Truc. 561-2 where Cyamus calls quinque nummi the pars Herculanea (i.e. tenth) of a mina ( = Ioo drachmae). In accordance with the Greek setting of comoediae palliatae Roman coins are not mentioned in Plautus. 220. uide, 'provide'; colloquial use with prandium, uinum, &c.

COMMENTARY: LINES 209-31

as objects ; cf. Cic. ad Att. v. I. 3 antecesserat Statius ut prandium nobis wiaeret.
221. neque... supersit: with the punctuation in the text defiat and supersit are impersonal, and neque. . . neque stand for neue... neue. By removal of the stop at satis, 220 , the words may be taken as a continuation of the relative clause. Scan qūuиsmodi by synizesis ; cf. 577.
222. Scan égo ĕt Mĕn|aechmus ; see Introd. 7. I. A. b, and cf. 320 än ŏplsono, 468, 1009.
223. On the hiatus see Introd. 7. IV. F. To avoid it here Palmer reads hominum unus munus, and Muretus munus hominum. There is a similar joke in a fragment of Eubulus quoted by Athenaeus, i. 14.
munus. . . fungitur: the acc. with fungor and similar verbs is the older usage, and appears normally in Plautus with fungor (cf. Trin. 1), potior (dep.), and abutor: with fruor and utur he generally uses abl.
225. cocta sunt: sc. opsonia, or perhaps indeterminate ; 'everything is as good as cooked '.
226. Menaechmus II (of Syracuse) and Messenio, as coming from the harbour, enter the stage R. (from the spectators' left), accompanied by sailors with baggage; cf. 350, 436. Men. II has left his conventinnal traveller's garb of chlamys and petasus at the ship, and appears like Men. I in pallium; hence confusion is easy. On these points cf. Introd. 4.
227. Scan quám |quŏm éx: this is permissible (cf. Introd. 7. IV. A. b. ii), though quam quando (Lactantius) and quam si quam (Brix) have been suggested.
228. terram conspiciunt: cf. the proverbial terram uidere expressive of relief after anxiety, as in Cic. de Sen. 19. 71 rut... quasi terram uidere uidear; so pro Mur. 2. 4.
non dicam dolo, 'I'll speak plainly', lit. 'without subterfuge '; cf. Trin. 90, 480.
229. quasi.. uideas: quasi here $=$ quam si, as elsewhere in Plautus; cf. Trin. 266 peius perit quasi saxo saliat; Aul. 231 ; so IIOI below tam quasi $=$ tamquam si. The sense is 'It's a greater pleasure (to see land at all) than if you were to set eyes on the country that was (once) your own'; a humorous exaggeration. P has quam si, which must be altered metri gratia; the first foot is a proceleusmatic. Most edd. read si, with the sense ' 1 t would be a still greater pleasure, if you were to see your own country'; but in A the line begins with $q \ldots$ Perhaps quom ( $=\frac{\text { örav }}{}$ ) is to be read.
fuerit: the tense implies that Men. has been so long a wanderer that he can hardly be said to have a patria. Cf. Vergil's fuimus Troes. SSubjunctive possibly due to 'mood-attraction'.
230. Scan quámób|rem.
231. quasi mare : sc. circumit. When circumire is written as one word, $-2 m$ is not elided; as Curc. 45 I circümīrier; cf. Hor. Sat. i. 9. 17 nil opus est te Circumagi. When elision is required the parts are separated, as Ter. Andr. 202 circum itione; cf. Asin. 742.

233. nam is here the interrogative particle, usually enclitic (as quidnam) ; cf. Aul. 42 nam qur, ibid. 44 nam qua . . caussa.
quid modi... quaerere : cf. 244 ; Poen. 1212 facere occasio est; Aul. 34 I ne operam perdas poscere. In Plautus the infinitive is still used to represent all cases of a verbal noun; in classical prose its oblique cases are supplied by the gerund. The latter usage is found in Plautus side by side with the former; cf. Asin. 882 quill modi, pater, amplexando facies; Epid. 271 munc occasiost faciundi; Amph. ioI4 sum defessus quaeritando.
234. Scan sex|tư̆s ĕst póst|quam ĕı̆ | rei ơpĕrám; rei forms a monosyllable and is elided; cf. $764^{\text {a }}$.
235. Hispanos: probably not in the Greek original, as foreign ships were excluded from the Carthaginian sphere of influence before 24 I B.C. ; the name is introduced here for the sake of alliteration with Histros.

Hilurios = Illyrios.
236. mare superum : the Adriatic.

Graeciamque exoticam: the Greeks of Hellas gave the name of $\mathfrak{\eta} \boldsymbol{\epsilon} \xi \xi \omega$ 'Ed入ais to the Greek settlements in South Italy, which the Romans called Magna Graecia.
238. Scan s乞̆ ăcumz: hiatus with shortening of monosyllable bearing ictus; cf. 460, 75 I .
credo really belongs to the apodosis inuenisses; so hercle Trin. 457.

238-9. si . . . quaereres ... inuenisses, sei appareret: according to Lindsay (Syntax of Plautus, p. 124), in a conditional sentence of this type, the verb of the protasis is in the imperfect if the protasis refers to the same time as the apodosis (in the plupcrfect if it refers to a previous time) ; in the apodosis the imperfect and pluperfect are apparently used promiscuously: cf. 24I, 460.
239. Sei appareret: i.e. if it had been forthcoming at all; corresponding to sei uiueret 24 I .
242. ergo: i. e. because it is so probable.
istuc, 'your guess', object of fuciat. certum and 243 scire are emphatic.
245. uiuos $=$ quamdiu uiuam. Final -os after $u$ was not written -us till the end of the Republican period; cf. I41 coquos. (See Lindsay's The Latin Langurge, p. 234.)
exsequi : sc. rem, 'to prosecute my search'.
246. illum : for this 'anticipatory' accusative see on solem uides, 179-80.
247. in scirpo, &c.: proverbial of fruitless labour. Warner tr 'this is washing of a Blackamore'.

COMMENTARY: LINES 23I-62

247-8. quin . . . redimus? used thus in its literal sense, quin ( $=q u \hat{i}$ née, how not? why not?) with the first person pres. ind, has the force of a strong exhortation; with the second person pres. ind. (or, colloquially, imperative, cf. 416) it is equivalent to a command; cf. 382, 561, 639, 660.
248. nisi si : this pleonasm occurs in Cicero's Letters, e.g. ad Fam. xiv. 2. I. historiam: in the Greek sense, 'an account of our travels'. Cf. the title of Lucian's 'A $\lambda \eta$ $\theta$ ins 'Ioropia, which was a satire on marvellous travellers' tales.
249. It is best to take the first two clauses as protases, the last as apodosis; for the form cf. Juv. iii. 100 rides, maiore cachinno Concutitur. Onions seeks to avoid hiatus by reading si caueas m ., but obviously the logical result should form the apodosis. Tr. 'If you do what you're told, and eat (be satisfied with) your allowance, you'll escape punishment'. Brix ${ }^{5}$ takes dictum fucessas alone as a condition; in this case datum edis $=$ ' you'll have your allowance'. The clauses may also all be taken as jussive: this suits caueas better ('avoid incurring punishment').
250. tuo ... modo, 'your way of going on', referring to his remarks 247-8.
hoc takes up molestus ne sis.
em! there!' This interjection is the syncopated imperative of emo, as can be seen from its use to accompany a blow: em tibr, 'take that!' Cf. IoI8. It must not be confused with hem, which expresses surprise or emotion. See Lindsay, Syntax of Pl., p. I 37.

25I-3 are spoken aside.
252. Note the alliteration.
253. Scan tàmĕn né̛quĕlo, the second foot being a proceleusmatic; cf. 229, 977, 983.
255. ulaticati . . . aestiue, 'we are furnished in summerfashion', i.e. lightly. In later Rome, people of fashion wore even lighter rings in summer; cf. Juvenal's sneer at the base-born Crispinus, who, to ape the great, uentilet aestiuom digitis sudantibus aurum Nec sufferre queat maioris pondera gemmae (i. 28-9). wiaticati is a comic formation, like patibulatum, Most. 56.
257. geminum dum quaeris qualifies nithil habebis; ubi nihil habebis qualifies gemes. Sense: 'you will have cause to lament, when you find you've spent everything in your search '. Note the play on words.
258. ita est : see on 485 .

260. sycophantae, 'sharpers'.
palpatores, 'flatterers', i.e. 'confidence-tricksters'. Cf. Amph. 506-7.

263-4. The name Epidamnus would most frequently be heard by a Roman in the accusative (e.g. in answer to the question quo is?). To Roman ears Epidamnum ( $\epsilon \pi i$ damnumn) sounded unlucky; hence the joke here, and the actual change of the name to Dyrrhachium when the town became a Roman colony (cf. 32 note). A similar case was that of the Greek colony Majócts, the name of which the Romans first corrupted (from the acc. Ma入óevta) into Maleuentum, and then changed to Beneuentum.
265. istuc, 'what you say'. For the accus. cf. 786, Asin. 43 caue sis nalam rem. See also note on 122 .
266. quid eo ueis? sc. facere : eo is instrumental.
aps te metuo: lit. 'I have fears on your side', i.e. 'as regards you'.
de uerbis tuis, 'arising from', i.e. 'in consequence of'. Cf. 934, Cas. 415 de labore pectus tundit.
267. duis: an optative form (used as subjunctive) of the stem $d \ddot{u}$-, a weakened form of the stem $d o u-$, a variant of $d \bar{o}-$. Cf. 308 perduint (a true optative).
268. tu magis amator: magis means 'more than I am'; on amator cf. 128. MSS. of the P group read tu magnus amator (cf. 259 potatores maxumei; Ter. Eun. 665 amatores . . . maxumos), but a break after the first syllable of an anapaest is rare. Fleckeisen reads tu amator magnus.
269. animi perditi is taken to mean 'a desperate fellow'; but perditus means either financially ruined or morally abandoned. Lipsius suggests perciti, 'excitable'; cf. Liv. xxi. 53.8 ingenium percitum ac ferox; Cic. Mil. 23. 63 animo irato ac percito. Plautus uses the word, Amph. 727, Cas. 628, &c., but not as an adjective.
270. cauero: as a general rule there is little difference in meaning between the future simple and the future perfect as used by Plautus, except that the latter denotes greater certainty; cf. feceris, 272. See Roby, § 1485.
272. serua : humorously emphatic.
me lubente feceris, 'I'll be glad if you (keep it intact)' he means: Men. thinks he means 'take it, and welcome'.
273. The 'Comedy of Errors' begins when Cylindrus, returning from market, mistakes Men. of Syracuse for Men. of Epidamnus. On the dramatic probability of the confusion generally see Introd. I.
274. pransoribus $=$ ei qui pransuri sunt; cf. raptori, 65. Livy was the first prose writer to use verbal nouns in tor and -sor participially; properly they denote permanent characteristics.
275. Scan sĕd ĕccuím; cf. 565 sĕd êccâm. Introd. 7. I. C. b.

see App. Crit., to which add Onions's excellent priu' iam conutuae deambulant (confusion of -ae and de-, and haplography).
277. opsonatu redeo: cf. 288, Cas. 719. For historic present with priusquam cf. Curc. 637 priu'quam moritur, mihi dedit.
278. di te amabunt : formal reply to a greeting.
279. Leo restores thus: quisquis sum? non tui scis, Menaechme, quis ego sim? (better, perhaps, quisquis ego sim? nescis, &c.) which would give sense required; but see App. Crit. The eye of the scribe of P jumped from quisquis 278 to quis 279 .
280. Hiatus at change of speakers coincident with caesura; or scan ubī ; cf. Truc. 506.
conuiuae: plural because the parasite $=$ octo homines, 223 . For colloquial omission of verb cf. Cas. 542 ubi tua uxor?
282. Brix gives certe ... homo to Menaechmus; see App. Crit., and cf. 288-93. The words, if spoken by the cook, are an aside; see 309 note.
283. dixin = nonne dixi: nonne is rare in Plautus, but is found occasionally before a vowel or $h$, e.g. Amph. 407; its place is taken by -ne, non, or satin, or even ecquid (cf. I46).
284. The Ambrosian palimpsest here shows traces of a line which does not appear in the P group.
286. Messenio takes Peniculum in the sense of 'clothes-brush', which, like a good valet, he has in his handbag.
287. numero: usually 'on the instant'; here 'too soon'; cf. Poen. 1272 que numero estis mortui?
289. porci: a pig was the usual scapegoat among the Greeks and Romans, and was offered not only as an expiation for crime, but in cases of madness, which was regarded as a divine punishment. The conventional cure was hellebore, procured chiefly at Anticyra on the Corinthian Gulf; Horace refers to both expiation and cure, Sat. ii. 3. 164 immolet aequis Hic porcum Laribus... Nauiget Anticyram; cf. Aesch. Eım. 283 каӨapرoïs $\grave{\eta} \lambda \dot{a} \theta_{\eta}$ रoヶpoкто́ขots.
290. sacres: archaic and religious variant of sacri, as impetrire for impetrare.
sinceri : pigs ten days old were considered puri (free from blemish) and therefore fit for sacrifice, Varro, de $R . R$. ii. 4. I6.
nummeis: i. e. at a didrachm apiece; cf. 219.
291. Scan iü̆bĕ té ; cf. 348, 1106 , and see Introd. 7. I. B. b. ii.
292. Better scanned with hiatus at caesura, as the word-accent falls on the penultimate syllable of insanum. Lorenz proposes insane insanum with elision of nam; cf. Aul. 314 parce parcum: but this makes ictus conflict with word-accent. The hiatus is possibly due to emphasis ; cf. Introd. 7. IV. D. d, p. 56.
certo scio: in classical prose pro certo; Cicero uses the colloquialism in letters, e. g. ad Att. iv. 3. I aueve te certo scio. 293. molestu's: cf. elocutu's 172 ; see Introd. 7. I. D. c. i, p. 46

MENAECHMI

294. The spondaic word in the fourth foot expresses pained surprise ; cf. the same in a similar passage, 499.
295. sei . . . seu: this, instead of siue (seut) . . . siue (seu) is the usual combination in Plautus.

Coriendru's: suggested by coriandrum, a seed used to flavour cakes.
perieris: a wish ; this tense is used partly because the meaning required is 'may you be completely confounded', and partly because the perf. subj. in -erim was originally an optative form, just as the fut. perf. in -ero was a subjunctive. Cf. Cas. 399 deliquerit.
297. tantum with quom . . . nomine 298.
quod sciam: limitative, 'as far as I know'; the antecedent of quod is an adverbial acc. understood. Cf. 500.
298. pro sano: cf. 927 haul pro insano.
299. nouisti : here aorist, not perfect as in 294, 296; 'where did you make my acquaintance?' Cf. 337, 50 I.
ubi ... nouerim: sc. quareris? the subj. is usual when a question is thus echoed.
300. Scan quĭ ămíc|am; see Introd. 7. IV. A. a. ii, p. 5 I.
302. Scan tizbū ; so $323,439, & c$.
303. cyathisso, 'fill your glass'; the cyathus was a ladle for transferring wine from the crater to the poculum. From Greek киадism; for the termination cf. graecissat, &c. 11-12.
quando temporal is used by the comic dramatists of indefinite time.

ḕ: an interjection.
304. quom nihil est: generally speaking, Plautus uses quom causal with the indicative when the reason given is a plain fact; cf. Capt. 995 cheu, quom ego . . . feci. See also 309 note.
qui : instrumental ablative ; cf. 452, 636, 743.
illic $:$ dative, $=$ illi-ce, as in $8=8,84 \mathrm{I}$. dimminuam : this verb is used by the comic dramatists in the phrases dimminuere ( $=$ disminuere) capht or cerebrum; cf. Most. 266, Ter. Ad. 57 I.
307. in illisce aedibus: pointing to the house of Menaechmus 1 .
308. illi[c]: either illi (adv.) must be written for illic, or we must read with Seyffert habĕs for habitas (cf. 69). Onions suggests di illum omnes, qui illic habitat, perduint, on the ground that ommes has been corrupted to homines (as often), and illum and habitat altered accordingly: this certainly suits the next line better.
309. Scan hiclquădĕm qui 动|se. This line is an aside; the cook dares not call Men. mad, except in a roundabout way, $310-315$. Cf. 282 note.
qui... dicit: contrast 313 qui... dicas. Plautus seems to use indic. and subj. impartially after a causal relative; cf. Poen.

1031-3. Perhaps the indicative lays stress on the fact as fact (cf. 904), the subjunctive on the fact as reason (cf. 374, 443).

3io. audin draws attention, like our ' I say!' (vulgar 'D'y'ear?').
3II. nummum illum : either a case of attraction to the relative, or, more probably, an anacoluthon natural in conversation; 'that half-crown you promised me-you'd better buy a pig with it yourself '. Cf. 64-5, 1052.

314-15. porculum : see on porci 289.
316. eu hercle: cf. 731, 872, 160 eu edepol ne, and on these combinations see note on 160 . In the absence of a finite verb they are normally followed by an accusative. Scan eǔ hêr|clĕ hŏmĭntem; hiatus after an interjection, with shortening of vowel or diphthong, is regular, see Introd. 7. IV. D. a. i; hiatus before cases of homo occurs often in MSS. of Plautus, and, when permissible on other grounds, may be allowed to stand, though Brix wished to change hominem, &c., to the archaic forms homonem, &c. (see Lindsay's Lat. Lang. p. 367), in all such passages; cf. Introd. 7. IV. F. p. 57.
multum, 'tedious', 'wearisome'; there is too much of him. The word is so used in classical prose; cf. Cic. de Orat. ii. $\varepsilon_{7}$ ne in re nota et peruolgata multus . . . sim. Livy and Tacitus use nimius in the same way.

317-18 are an 'aside' addressed to the audience. Line 317 has more point if 3 IÚ is given to Men., as by Brix and other edd. 316 , if given to Mess., is an aside, and 317 is an abrupt and awkward continuation of $310-15$.
318. quam uis: used here, as always by Plautus, in its literal sense of '(as much) as you wish' (classical quantumuis).
ridiculus: in active sense.
319. quid ais tu? to call Men.'s attention; cf. 162.
quid ais, inquam. Impatient repetition. Menaechmus and Messenio are whispering together and pay no attention. This is Goldbacher's emendation of MSS. qui uis; most edd. read quid uis, and distribute the line thus: quid ais tu? MEN. quid uis, inquam (cf. 3ro). CY. satin hoc, &c.
hoc quod uides: he shows him the contents of the sportula.
320. an opsono: the 'deliberative' pres. indic. is colloquial, and therefore common in comedy; cf. Most. 774 eon, uoco huc hominem? So elsewhere, Juv. iv. I3O conciditur? Cic. ad Att. xiii. 40 aduolone an maneo? So we say "What do we do next?'

32 I . tibi ... mulieri : in apposition to uobis; out of place here; such careless order is colloquial.

321-2. quas [tu] mulieres ... loquere? An expression of indignant repudiation; cf. Pseud. I 195 quem tue Pseudolum, quas tue mihi praedicas fallacias ? Curc. 546 ; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 16. 7 quem tu mihi pompilum, quem denarium narras, quam tyrotarichi patinam ? Unless the first $t u$ is omitted, the lines must be scanned sì tos, &c., where the double change of ictus and therefore of accent is impossible, though apparently supported by $281-2$ párasitím. . . parasitum (where, however, change in place of poss. adj. alone justifies it). For omission of first tu cf. Curc. 613 quod argentum, quas tu mihi tricas narras?

322. quod... scelus: i.e. what crime for which you are paying the penalty of madness, as manifested by your behaviour? See on 289 .
323. quid . . . rei? ' what have you to do with me ?' rei partitive, cf. $369-70$; so in good prose, quid hoc rei est ? 'what's the matter?' For täbū cf. 302.
325. For hiatus after tu bearing ictus cf. 651, 744.
326. madebunt faxo, 'I'll warrant they'll be cooked'; colloquial paratactic construction, cf. 950 potabis faxo; also with subj. II3 faxo ... wisas; cf. 539, 644. On the form faxo see 113 note.
nil morabitur: sc. cenam, or perhaps me; morari is always transitive in Plautus.
327. prōn tu, like proinde, introduces a command or exhortation; cf. 782.
ne... abeas: in O. Lat. prohibitions in the second person are expressed by ne with pres. subj., perf. subj., and pres. imperat. impartially.
longius ('too far'), if correct, retains the original long vowel of the comparative stem (longiōs-) ; but see App. Crit. Cf. also 846, and see Introd. 7. III. b, p. 49.
328. numquid uis? polite formula of leave-taking; cf. 548. The proper reply is zaleas. Men, takes it literally; cf. 138, and Ter. Ad. 432 SY. numquid uis? DE. mentem uobis melioren dari.
maxumam ... crucem : the simple accus., as well as accus. with in, is found in this phrase in O. Lat. (e.g. Pers. 352, Poen. 496). In the early stage of a language relations are sufficiently defined by case-endings; gradually the force of the case-suffix is weakened, and as the growing complexity of life necessitates greater exactness of expression, relations begin to be more clearly defined by the employment of adverbs which, occurring constantly with particular cases, become what we call prepositions 'governing' those cases. In the final stage prepositions almost entirely replace case-endings, as in modern French. Relics of the older usage in Latin appear in common phrases like domum ire, rure redire, &c.; cf. 396 ire infitias, 1020 suppetias . . . adueni. See Lindsay, Lat. Lang., p. 572. On this permissible double iambic ending see Introd. 6. 11. A. f. iii, and cf. 66, 915 , 1017.
329. ire . . . te: the line begins as though he were about to return the curse, but finishes with a thoughtful suggestion.
332. potius quam ... astes: the subjunctive is commonly used in Latin to express an excluded alternative; cf. 726, 1059; $A \sin$. 816; Livy iii. 21. 6 peccate potius quam ...faciant; here, however, an $u t$ may be understood. Plautus also uses the fut. indic. thus, e.g. Cist. 533 perdam operam potius quam carebo filia.

333. abiit? (abiit): cf. 550. For haplography in MSS. cf. 808.
334. tua uerba: 258-64.
335. meretricem... mulierem : cf. Mil. 563 hominem seruom.
336. Scan $\bar{u} t$ quưdem $\bar{z} \mid l e$.
338. minime... mirum : Brix points out that while the copula is never omitted by Plautus in certain phrases (certum est, opus est, \&c.), it is nearly always omitted in phrases of an exclamatory nature (e. g. Capt. 176 facete dictum ; Stich. 374 nimi' factum bene), especially in phrases with mirum, such as (non) mirum si, mirum ni, mirum quin. He compares Gk. oùȯ̀v $\operatorname{\theta av\mu a\sigma \tau óv,~Germ.~kein~}$ Wunder; cf. our 'no wonder (that)'. See also 434, 650, 1024.
339. ancillulas: ancilla is the usual feminine of seruos; serva is rare. The force of the diminutive is 'naughty little slaves'.
340. peregrina nauis: literal in this line; with quoiatis sit it must be supplied in the sense of 'stranger'; cf. the gender of perditum 343; tr. 'foreign merchantman', which can be used in both senses. In 344 nauis is purely metaphorical.
341. quoiatis: original uncontracted form of quoias ( $=$ cuias ; cf. nostras) ; cf. Poen. 994 ; Curc. 407.
343. perditum, 'plucked'.
amittunt: classical dimittunt; cf. 1055 ; so generally in Pl. and Ter.
344. nūnc ĭ́n is|toc portu; i. e. Erotium's house.
nauis, as the text stands, must be scanned as a monosyllable, like vaüs. Brix quotes parallels (e.g. Bacch. 1017 caun $\overline{\text { ssĕ }}$ ), which, however, are doubtful. See App. Crit.
347. monuisse: the subject of the infin. is omitted, as often ; cf. Epid. 238 dissimulabam earum operam sermoni dare. In this play $46 \mathrm{I}, 482,524,538$.
349. hoc: probably the uidulus or handbag; cf. 286.
350. haec: all the luggage.
sultis $=$ si uoltis ('if you please'); so sis $=$ si uis, sodes $=$ si audes.
nauales pedes: comic appellation of remiges, from their function. They had accompanied Men. to carry the luggage; cf. 436,445 :

MENAECHMI

352. For the asyndeton cf. Cic. ad Fum. ii. 5. 2 para, meditare, cogita.
fiat may depend on uide.
353. sternite lectos: i. e. put rugs and cushions on the diningcouches. The plural shows that this is addressed to the inferior ancillae.
odores: by metonymy for 'fragrant spices'.
munditia, 'smartness', not 'neatness'; Horace's simplex munditios is usually mistranslated.
354. amoenitas, 'pleasant surroundings'.
malost $=$ damno est.
355. item hinc ultro, 'and so by my free gift'; hinc =ame; cf. 799.
potissumus: as long as pallae, &c., are forthcoming ; cf. 192.
nostrae domi : so Most. 874 ; but in nostra domo (Cas. 620 ).
356. mira uidentur: so often mira sunt, cf. 1046; usually with si or ni, Cas. 191; Pseud. 1216; Trin. 861.
357. quoi pateant : concessive ; cf. 397. On quoi see Arg. 1.
358. quam domu' tua: sc. est tua; or (removing comma from pateant 362 to tua) sc. patet.
quom . . . sit, 'since my house is more (truly) yours than your own is'. Plautus usually employs the indicative with causal (and concessive) quom ; perhaps the subjunctive here implies that the reason given is not a hard fact ; cf. 304 note.

367-8. prandium ut iussisti, &c.: repetition of $364-5$, as the supposed Menaechmus I has taken no notice.
369. Men. is speaking to Messenio.
equidem: not = ego quidem, though normally used with the first person; the $e^{-}$is perhaps the prefix found in ecastor, edepol, &c. See note on egoquidem, 1071.
370. quia: elliptical ; supply est res mihi tecum (quia).
371. neque id haud, 'and that too not . . '' This doubling of the negative is found in Plautus (in Terence only once, Andr. 205) with neque (nec) as the first negative; according to Brix, this is because the negative force of neque is weakened by its having to act as a conjunction. The two negatives are normally separated by a pronoun; Bacch. 1037 neque ego hau committam, Epid. 664 neque ille haud obiciet mihi. So nec... numquam 1027.
372. ecastor: see on 213 . Scant títis me (or $t \overline{212 s}$ ). fiorentem facis: for the periphrasis cf. Amph. Iozo quem... faciam feruentem flagris; Pseud. 1041 qui te nunc flentenn facit.

373-4. The weakness of the plot is obvious here. Menaechmus would surely have remembered his quest in real life. But he does not remember even Messenio's warnings $(258,338)$, or what the cook said (331).
375. istaec: i. e. what is now happening to you.

376. praeut si ... erimus: praeut and praequam are used to contrast two occurrences of which one is more striking than the other; cf. 935, Most. 981 n hil hoc quidem est . . . prae quam alios dapsilis sumptus facit; Amph. 374 parum etiam praeut futurum est praedicas. In the present case either a verb (such as futurum est) must be supplied with praeut, or the stop at erimus removed; cf. Aul. 507 sed hoc etiam pulchrum est praequam ubi sumptus petunt (i. e. praequam est ibi ubi s.p.). The literal meaning of this passage is 'Mere leaves are now falling (on you) in comparison with how (things will turn out) if we stay', &c. Warner gives the general sense: "These be but leaves that fall upon you now, in comparison of the trees that will tumble on your necke shortly.' Erasmus quotes a proverb of similar meaning, post folia cadunt arbores.
triduom hoc, 'the next three days'; contrast 104 hos dies multos.
377. elecebrae : probably coined by Plautus; also Bacch. 944. Ladies of Erotium's stamp entice money out of one's pockets.
378. sine . . dum : separation of the enclitic, as in Livy iii. 60. 1o nec omnes dum eductos.
379. Hiatus after emphatic tu not bearing ictus (see Introd. 7. IV. A. a. ii), and at change of speaker coinciding with diaeresis.
nouisti : ct. 299, 337.
380. tetulit: an old reduplicated perfect form of stem tol-, used as the perfect of fero; hence the perfect of réfero is rettuli $=$ rétetuli (as originally accented). Cf. 630.
delicias facis, ' you're joking'.
381. quin ... is: see on $247-8$ quin . . . redimus.
amabo, 'please', is used chiefly by women in O. Latin, mostly with an imperative (as in $405,541,678$ ) or equivalent (as here), or with a question (where the imperative of a verb of telling may be supplied). It is to be referred to a suppressed protasis: 'I'll love you (if you do).' Cf. Cic. ad Att. ii. 4 amabo te, cura ut . . . transigas. For another use see 425, 524.
tibi erit rectius: cf. 626 quid tibi aegre est?
382. Scan nümiù mī̀ōr quŭd hŏc| sit; cf. II29-30 séd mĭhi höc | résponde.
oboluit . . . huic: cf. Aul. 216 aurum huic olet.
383. He hands back the purse to Messenio.
scibo: the original form of the fourth conjugation future; the ending $-b o(=f u o)$ is a suffix formed from the stem $f u$ - seen in fui. The ending -am of regular third and fourth conjugation futures is a subjunctive form that replaced the true future-suffix. Cf. roog subuenibo, IIOI seruibo.
384. bene uocas, 'it's good of you to ask me': polite refusal ; cf. benigne, Hor. Epp. i. 7. 16.
tam gratiast: a similar formula, probably elliptical; e.g.

here supply quam si intro eam: cf. Hor. Epp. i. 7. I8 tam teneor dono quam si dimittar onustus.

390. malum : used as an enclitic interjection after an interrogative, e. g. Rud. 945 quid tu, malum, nam me retrahis? Cf. Cic. ad Att. v. 20. I qui, malum, isti Pindenissetae? Probably it stands for malum tibi sit.
391. baxeae: according to a gloss of the scholiast Placidus, these were high-heeled shoes.
392. scilicet, ' why, of course'.
 the hiatus cf. 448 quăm hodie, 601 , and see Introd. 7. IV. A. b. i. quid est? ' what's that ?'
395. cantherino ritu. Horses can sleep standing. The hiatus may be due to the old ablative-ending $-d$; but see App. Crit. Cf. Cist. 291 utrum deliras, quaeso, an astans sommias?
396. qui lubet, 'how can you like to . . . ?'
ire infitias: for the accus. see on 328, and cf. Io20 suppetias ... adueni. The phrase here takes the construction of nego; so Livy vi. 40.4 .
397. facta quae sunt: i. e. fucta (ea esse) quae (facta) sunt: or perhaps direct object ; cf. 1057 note.
quod negem : virtually oblique; sc. me fecisse.
quod fecerim : concessive $=$ quom id fecerim.
399. Hiatus at the diaeresis; cf. Introd. 7. IV. C. a; frequent in this play, e. g. 406, 604, 68i, $696,778,851,859,923,939-40$, 1013 , 1028, 1091, 1094.
400. penetraui pedem : cf. 816 . This verb is always transitive in Plautus (= classical inferre), and generally reflexive, as Amph. 250 penetrant se in fugam.

40I. eccere: probably an oath by Ceres; cf. edepol, ecastor.
402. quam tu mihi . . narras? see on 321-2. Men. takes the question literally ; cf. 328.
403. tritam: it suits the rest of the line best to take this as 'planed', not ' battered by storms'.
fixam: i. e. with wooden nails (pali) driven in by the malleus.
excussam: from excudo; for the double $s$ cf. I47 essuri ( $=$ ed-suri $), 458$ essum.
404. quasi supellex pellionis: supply est from end of line. 'It's like a furrier's outfit', i. e. when he stretches out a skin to be cured. Perhaps a play on the words is intended: note the alliteration.
palus palo proxumust : i. e. in the ship, as on the skin.
405. As it stands this line is unmetrical, as iam cannot remain long before a vowel. Fleckeisen proposes $i \vec{a} m$ ăm $\bar{a}|b \bar{o} d \bar{d}| \mid s \hat{z} s t e ̆ . ~$
406. nésciō quem : nescio in conjunction with quis is, in Plautus, generally a dactyl ; but cf. Merc. 365. The connexion of thought is: '(I cannot accept your invitation) as you take me for someone else.' There is no need to assume a lacuna with Ritschl. Fleckeisen reads nēscĭŏquem $\langle t u\rangle$.
409-10. ubi, 'where' (referring to Syracusis).
409-12. Agathocles and Hiero were historical characters well known to the Romans. The former was tyrant of Syracuse 317289 B. C. ; the latter was elected strategus in 269 , and made himself tyrant by force (not peacefully as Erotium says) in 265. Phintia and Liparo are inventions here, the former being the name of a tyrant of Agrigentum about 280 B. C., the latter probably being suggested by the Liparae Islands off Sicily. Plautus (or his Greek original) is true to life in representing a woman of Erotium's class as guilty of such blunders. An Aspasia was rare. With regard to the bearing of this passage on the date of the play see Introd. 3 .
412. Hiero est : sc. regnator.
413. Messenio is startled out of his suspicions ( 338 seq.) ; but they soon return (416).
illinc: from Syracuse.
414-15. The connexion is: if she is a fellow-Syracusan, I cannot persist in my refusal.
416. periisti : the perfect indic. expresses the certainty of the result.
intrassis: an aorist-stem subjunctive form used as fut. perf. indic. Cf. faxis il3. For the tense see note on 847 .
quin :.. tăcĕ: a substitute for quin with 2 pers. pres. indic., equivalent to a strong or indignant command ; cf. 382, and see on 247-8. Cf. also Verg. Aen. iv. 547 quin morere ... ferroque auerte dolorem.
418. si possum : Plautus uses si with a verb (usually possum) in the subj. to express 'to see if', 'in the hope of', exactly as classical writers do, with one exception ; when (as here) the dependent verb is in the first person, and present time is referred to, the indicative is used. Cf. Mil. 1207 nam si possem ullo modo impetrare ... operam dedi (past time); Verg. Aen. vi. 78 bacchatur uates, magnum si pectore possit Excussisse deum (third person); Hir. Epp. i. 7. 39 inspice, si possum donata reponere laetus (a reminiscence of Ylautine usage) ; 1048-9 below, ibo . . . si possum exorare.
iam dudum. So far Men. has been speaking aside to Messenio ; he now speaks aside to Erotium, pretending that he does not want Mess. to overhear him.

419-20. non inprudens: classical consulto or de industria. aduorsabar ) (adsentabor 417.
ni here $=n \bar{e}$; both represent an original form nei. Both $n e i$ and $n i$ are common in inscriptions; this $n i$ is also found in Lucretius, Propertius, and perhaps in Vergil, Aen. iii. 684-6 contra iussa monent Heleni . . . Ni teneant cursus. Cf. also 881, and Prop. ii.7. 1-3legem Qua quondam edicta flemus uterque diu Ni nos diuideret.

422. quando uis : causal, cf. 202, Trin. 573 quando ita uis.
424. fecero: i. e. occludam fores, implied in what Men. has said.
425. quid te amabo ut facias, 'what I'll be much obliged to you for doing'; cf. 524-5; 7'ruc. 872 amabo ut . . . sinas eum esse apud me. For the ordinary use of amabo cf. 382 ; its use with an ut-clause may havearisen by analogy from its use with a prohibition (e. g. Cic. at Q. Fr. i. 4. I amabo te, ne . . . sceleri meo . . . assignes), or on the analogy of rogo ut (ne).
426. dederas: the pluperfect means ' on your last visit'.
phrygionem : gold-embroiderers were so designated because the Phrygians were especially skilled in the art ; cf. milliner $=$ Milaner (from Milan).
427. opera: e.g. trimming and alterations. What suited a matrona would not be smart enough for a meretrix. See Introd. 4. 428. hercle qui: cf. 1092 ; Trin. 464; so pol qui. In these phrases $q u i$ is sometimes taken as indefinite (' By Jove, somehow'); but it is more probably exclamatory (interrogative) $=\theta a v \mu a \sigma \tau \omega \bar{\omega} \dot{\omega}$ : ' Egad, how . .. !’
eadem : adverb. Hiatus may be avoided by adding enim with Vahlen. Fleckeisen suggests $\bar{e} a d e m$ (operā$\rangle(=$ simull): operā may have dropped out through confusion with operă, 427.
ignorab:tur, 'made unrecognizable, disguised', hence followed by final clause. Cf. 468.
429. The palla was generally worn as a wrap.
430. maxume $=$ Greek $\mu a ́ \lambda \iota \sigma \tau a$, adverb of assent in conversation.

43I. hunc . . . conloqui : cf. Pseud. 252, and acc. with conuenire, 40 I above.

432-3. Hiatus is not unusual before or after proper names, esp. if in vocative, but see App. Crit.; huc accede is the regular order.
tsussciri : no convincing emendation has been proposed. The best suggestion is Bothe's sussili ; cf. Curc. 151, where Phaedromus implores the bars of his lady's door, sussilite opsecro; Cas. 931 supsilit, optundit os mihi. Addressed to Men. it would mean 'up and away!' Brix ${ }^{5}$ assigns sussili ('jump up') to Men.; he supposes that during the conversation of Erotium and Men., Messenio sits sulking on the baggage (cf. 350). If the word is given to Men. it would be simpler to take it in the sense 'jump for joy'; cf. Varro, quoted by Nonius, 135. 28 non supsilis ac plaudis? Possibly suscipe (Ritschl) is to be read; Men. points to the baggage and says, 'take this up' (cf. 436).
434. ut ne dicas, 'to save you the trouble of telling me'; ut ne introduces a final clause, cf. Ter. And. 259; usually separated, as Epid. 356 ; Pers. ino. The MSS. have ut me dicas, except $\mathrm{B}^{2}$, which gives ut me dices; Brix adopts the latter in the sense qualem me dices.

A further difficulty is the division of the speeches. If the arrangement of the present text is accepted, the connexion is as follows (reading sussili 432-3): mess. 'What's the matter? Up and away!' men. 'Why should I ?' mess. 'You must -- ' (he is going to say 'avoid danger '). MEN. (interrupting) 'I know (what you are going to say), so that you need not say it.' mess. '(You are) so much the worse (if you are acting thus with your eyes open)'. Brix ${ }^{5}$ divides thus: (432-3) MESS. quid negoti est? MEN. sussuli. (434) MESS. quid eo opust? MEN. opust. saio ut me dices: i.e.' You must ! I know what you're going to call me ' (ut $=$ 'how'). Cf. Stich. 95 an. quil' opust? pan. opust. tanto nequior: sc.es; for the omission cf. Stich. 749 tanto miserior; Tiuc. 953 tanto meline, and see note on 338.
435. habeo . . operis: military metaphor; 'I have the spoil in my grasp, such fine siege works have I begun'. Taken literally, this line is inconsistent with est ... nobis, 441: perhaps praedam here should be altered to praedem. For the hiatus cf. 431.
quantum potes = quan celerrime; cf. 549; Aul. in 9 quantum potero; so quantum potest impersonally, 850, 1056; Aul. 399, &c. Cf. Cic. ad Att. iv. I3, ix. 7.
436. istos: the nauales perdes, 350 .
437. ante solem occasum : cf. Io22; XII Tab. (Gell. xvii. 2. 10) sol occasus suprema tempestas esto; in this phrase the participle has neuter force, as in iuratus, pransus, potus.
uenias aduorsum : a phrase applied to a slave fetching (or carrying) his master home from a dinner-party ; cf. 445, 464, 987 ; Most. 938,947 . Donatus says that such a slave was called aduorsitor, and in the dram. pers. of the Most., Phaniscus Aduorsitor appears; but the word does not occur elsewhere.
438. Ritschl suggests atque hinc abi to fill the lacuna; Vahlen et fac tuom (' mind your own business'), which suits the next line better. Palmer thinks that uerbero may have dropped out through homoeoteleuton with fecero 439.
440. Warner paraphrases: 'Peace foolish knave, seest thou not what a sot she is ; I shall coozen her I warrant thee.'
442. lembum, 'cockboat', not a match for a nauis; cf. 344.
diērectum with ducit: ' is towing it to the deuce'; dierectus (lit. 'spread-eagled', i. e. 'crucified') is so used in curses, Poen. 347 i dierecte in maxumam malam crucem. Perhaps, as Nettleship suggests, dierectus is 'some bastard issue of $\delta \iota a \rho \rho \eta \eta \gamma \nu \nu \mu$ '; $\delta \iota a \rho p a \gamma \epsilon i \eta s$ ('split you') is a curse common in Gk. comedy.
443. postulem, 'expect', takes acc. and infin. on the analogy of uolo. (Gk. $\left.\begin{array}{l}\mathrm{j} \\ \mathrm{\omega} \\ \omega\end{array}\right) \quad \mathrm{Cf} .767$.
445. sequimini : to the sailor-porters. Exeunt Mess. and porters, leaving stage clear; second pause in the play.

MENAECHMI

446. Peniculus has lost Menaechmus I in a crowd, and returns to Erotium's house as the most likely place in which to find him.

The first hiatus is inadmissible ; see App. Crit. On the second see Introd. 7. IV. A. b. ii, p. 52.
interea loci, ' neanwhile' ; cf. nusquam . . . gentium, 262.
450. ducere : sc. secum.
451. qui illum . . . perảuint : qui ('how') is frequently used thus with the force of utinam (Gk. $\dot{\omega}$ ) ; cf. 931-3; so also simple ut, Aul. 785 ut illum di . . . perduint; cf. Hor. Sat. ii. I. 43 ut pereat positum robigine telum; Verg. Aen. x. 631. Cf. also hercle qui, 428. On perduint see 267 note.
452. qui : instrumental; cf. 636.
occupatos: like himself. The parasite takes his profession seriously.
453. To avoid the hiatus Onions proposes non ad eam rem $n i$ otiosos (not interrogative), Vahlen, non saltem, with the sense : 'if assemblies must be held, at any rate men with nothing to do might be employed to attend them '. (For the restrictive use of saltem cf. 624; Amph. 438; Merc.637-8.) See, however, Introd. 7. IV. A. b. ii. Perhaps there is a pause at rem to emphasize otiosos (Introd. 7. IV. D. d, p. 56).
454. quom citentur : his suggestion is that whenever a contio is held, the names of ciues otiosi should be read out like those of ablebodied citizens at a dilectus, and that those who failed to turn up should be punished.
census capiat ilico : this is the reading of $A$ and of $B^{2}$, and may be interpreted (I) taking census as nom. sing., 'punishment (the censor's rebuke) should overtake them ': there is no parallel for census in this sense, but censio is so used, e.g. Aul. 601 censione bubula; still more to the point is Rud. 1269 seq., where one speaker replies censeo to all questions, until the other says adsum equidem, ne censionem semper facias, which may be taken either 'so don't punish me for non-attendance', or 'don't keep saying censeo'. Perhaps census $=$ fine; see below. (2) Taking census as acc. plur., the subject being magistratzes understood (so P, census capiant, sc. magistratūs) ; 'he should assess them (preparatory to a fine)'; or simply 'he should amerce them in a fine', though the latter meaning of census cannot be paralleled. Still less can it mean pignora (as Pareus says). Leo solves the difficulty by reading pignus capiat. Senators failing to attend meetings of the Senate were liable to seizure of goods (pignoriscapio), which they could redeem by paying a fine. Perhaps censu capiat, 'deprive them of civil rights', may be suggested on the analogy of censu trohibere (excludere) and altero captus oculo.
457. adfatim : used substantively with part. gen. ; cf. 91. escas, 'meals'.
458. negoti, 'belly-businesses ' (Warner).

COMMENTARY: LINES 446-72

459. contioni . . . comitieis: a contio was a non-voting assembly convened by a magistrate when he wished to inform the people on some point ; comitia were voting assemblies held for elections, trials, or legislation.
 81 5-16 sĭ ego.

46I. datum uoluisse : supply eum (i. e. Menaechmum) as subject to datum (sc. prandium) uoluisse; for the omission cf. 347; '(I) to whom I am as sure that he would not have grudged it as that I am alive'. The combination of wolo with a past participle to signify desire (cf. II20) or (as here) acquiescence is a classical use. For tam ...quam with verbs cf. Ter. Eun. 718 Parmenonis tam scio esse hanc techinam quam me wiuere. Scan dăt|itm uoolừ|īsse, which forms a word-group like volüptás-mea or coctúm-dabo, and is accented as a polysyllable.
462. etiamnum $=$ etiam nunc.
463. cum corona: Greeks and Romans put on garlands when dessert appeared; they believed that alcoholic fumes were so prevented from rising too high. Pen. knows from this sign that sublatum est conuiuium.
464. sublatum est : he has no hope even of the reliquiae. uenio aduorsum : sarcastic ; cf. 437.
465. hominem: here the 'anticipatory' accusative follows the dependent clause.
466. Menaechmus II is speaking to Erotium within as he comes out of her house; he is tired of her reiterated instructions.
potine ut $=$ potisne es ut, i. e. potesne facere ut. Cf. 627; Pers. 175 potin ut taceas? potin ne moneas? So Poen. 916.
hanc : the palla.
468. non with eam ( $=$ eandem).
íta ĭg|norabitur, 'it will be so well disguised'; cf. 428.
469. Peniculus hears these loudly-spoken words (466-8), but when Men. moves away across the stage and talks to himself (473-7, 480-5) he can hear only a few words. See Introd. 4, p. I7.
47 I . Pen. felt bound to avenge such treatment in the interests of his profession. Hiatus is perhaps possible after a monosyllable without ictus ; cf. 379 note. But rhythm will coincide with accent if we scan non herclĕ tे $\mid$ sum quit |sum: for this hiatus cf. 316 . See also App. Crit.
472. opserua quid dabo, 'wait and see how I'll pay him out (give him what for)': or, if we are to accept Langen's explanation that in this and similar phrases $d_{0}$ has the meaning of $-d o(=\tau i \theta \eta \mu \mathrm{l})$ in the compounds condo, abdo, \&c., 'wait and see what I'll do'. Cf. Pers. 292 specta quid dedero; Ter. Phorm. 1027 sic dubo. These phrases, used as threats, are to be distinguished from the expression of satisfaction (generally malicious) sic datur ; see note on 604, and cf. 628. Sic dedero is used in both ways; contrast

Poen. 1286 (a threat) with $A \sin .439$ (an expression of satisfaction).

473-4. pro di: cf. 957, rooi ; Ter. Ad. 447. pro in these cases is followed by a vocative. Where interjectional pro is followed by accus. there is an ellipse of a verb, e.g. pro uostram filem, sc. imploro.
quoí hŏmlini : for the hiatus cf. $374,786,789$.
476. Hiatus at a strong pause in sense, accentuated by chiasmus. Warner tr. 'Such cheare, such a dinner, such kinde entertainment!'
477. hanc: sc. pallam.
heres: here in the archaic sense of 'possessor'; cf. 62 ; Bacch. 849 exheredem fecero uitae.
erit: sc. Erotium.
478. exaudire clanculum, 'hear clearly from my hidingplace'.
479. de parti mea: he has caught the word heres, 477 , which he takes in the other sense. Cf. 493.
parti : cf. 492 apsenti. The original ablative-ending of I-stems was $-\bar{\imath} d$, becoming $-\bar{\imath}$ by loss of the $-d$; consonant stems at first availed themselves of this ablative-ending (cf. 1020 temperi; Capt. 914 carni; and uirtutei on the tomb of a Scipio of date I30 B.C.); later the instrumental and locative termination $-\breve{e}(=-\breve{z})$ competed with this I-stem abl.-ending, not only in consonant stems, but also in I-stems, till in classical Latin only a few I-stem nouns preferred abl. in $-i$; in Plautus, however, we always find sorti, ciui, noui, \&c. See Lindsay, Lat. Lang., pp. 390-I.

480 . The double iambic ending is permitted when, as here, there is an elision after the fourth foot.
481. quoniam here temporal $=$ quom iam. The addition of -iam makes the pres. the appropriate tense; see note on 24 postquam iam.
482. errare: sc. eam: for the omission cf. 347, 461, 524.
res: an euphemism, 'intrigue'. Fr. une affiaire. Scan rès cưm è| $a ;$ cf. 448-9.
483. dixerat: cf. 717 quemquem aspexerat. The pluperf. indic. is used in Latin of the best period to express indefinite frequency; cf. Cic. Verr. 11. v. II. 27 cum rosam uiderat, tum incipere uer arbitrabatur. Later the pluperf. subj. gradually displaces it.

485 . bene fui, 'had a good time'; colloquial use of an adverb with esse; cf. 100 ; Merc. 583 puluhre ut simus; more often the verb is impersonal, as 603,621 ; Cist. 59 male mihi est ; and bene est ( $p_{c}(\sin i n)$. Menaechmus, like the first Duke of Marlborough, was 'thrifty in his vices'.
486. turbare, 'upset him ',' give him fits'.
487. The scansion quĭd atzs is here to be preferred to quŭd $\frac{1}{a z s}$, as a double iambic ending is avoided except under certain conditions; see Introd. 6. II. A. f. As aio (properly aiio) was of the fourth conjugation, the final syllable of ais was originally long; cf. 820 .

488. leuior quam pluma : proverbial expression; cf. Poen. 812.
489. flagítil|ŭm hớmin $\mid$ is = fuggitiose homo; the genitive is one of definition. Similar phrases are scelus uiri; Ter. Eun. 696 monstrum hominis; Pers. 848 frustum pueri; Poen. I310 hallex uiri. On the hiatus consult Introd. 7. IV. F, p. 57 ; cf. 709.
490. perderes: final, but transl., 'that you should wish to injure me'; cf. Aul. 735-6 quid ego $\langle$ de te $\rangle$ demerui . . . mali, quamobrem ita faceres.
491. ut, 'how (meanly)!’ Brix takes it as temporal, and puts comma at foro.
492. fecisti funus : cf. the metaphor, 152-3.
apsenti : cf. 479. In classical Latin, ablative-ending $-e$ of the pres. part. was always used in the abl. abs. construction; this differentiation was not fixed in Plautus's time.
493. quoii . . . heres eram: quoii refers back to prandio; colloquial carelessness of arrangement. As co-heir Peniculus had the right of sharing the arrangements for the burial. Cf. 477, 479.
495. qui . . . dicas : see on 309. Pronounce mi male dicas or mihi mal'dicas to avoid four consecutive short syllables.
ignoto. The P group of MSS. have hic noto, which is altered in $\mathrm{B}^{2}$ to hic ignoto (' one who is a stranger here'): see App. Crit. Hiatus may be justified as marking indignant astonishment ; cf. 563, and see Introd. 7. IV. D. d, p. 56.
496. malam rem: i.e. a blow. To Peniculus, however, mala res primarily means loss of a free meal ; hence his answer.
497. The text is corrupt here. The reading of P is post eam quidem, \&c., which is meaningless; A has pol as first word. Pol eam quidem edepol may perliaps be justified on the ground that a repetition of expletives is a natural symptom of excitement. The reading in the text embodies Goldbacher's correction quam for quidem (see App. Crit.). The speech is sarcastic: 'Yes! on the top of that bad turn which I'm well aware you have done me.. Scan $\overline{e a m} \mid$ quăm eैdĕ $p o l$ (hiatus beforc expletive).
499. nomen : spondaic word in fourth foot ; cf. 294.
502. si ... facias . . . ne sies: this form of expression corresponds to Gk. $\dot{\epsilon} a \boldsymbol{a} \nu$ with subj. as protasis to a command or prohibition; cf. IO3 note; tr. ' if you are to behave properly, you musn't . . .' Cf. also Io23. On the hiatus see Introd. 7. IV. A. a. ii, p. 5 I.
506. sincipūt (? see App. Crit.) : comic for caput. Intellego is parenthetic, as scio, credo frequently; the quantity of the final syllable may therefore be justified; see Introd. 7. 111. c, p. 49.
508. Hiatus at the caesura is possible in a line spoken with comic solemnity ; cf. Introd. 7.IV. D. d. Bothe, however, proposed dedidisti ; Müller's detulisti is more probable ; cf. 133, 173, 393.

MENAECHMI

510. pallam is object to both verbs; for the order cf. Io91. Scan sătĭn sà nuze.

51I. occisast haec res, 'that's an end of the matter'; the phrase is similar to our 'there's no more to be said '; cf. Capt. 539; Bacch. 161 occisus hic homo est, 'his number's up'. Pen. is in despair at Men.'s barefaced lying, but recovers himself sufficiently to make a last appeal (non ego . . pallam?), which naturally infuriates Men.
513. cinaedos: effeminate persons who danced publicly in the palla; cf. 197-8.
tū és: see App. Crit.; but hiatus is permissible after an emphatic monosyllable not bearing ictus; cf. 379 .

514-15. Scan füzsse.
516. non tu abis? pres. for fut. of eo and compounds is very common in colloquial speech ; cf. Gk. $\epsilon_{i}^{i} \mu i=i b 0$, and our ' I go away to-morrow '.
517., piari : see note on 289, and cf. 291 iube te piari.
iŭbě : for hiatus before a vocative cf. 1003-4. With Pylades's correction iubes, the stop at dignus es must be removed.
519. iăm ǔt|i sit: see Introd. 7. IV. A. b. i. Brix's correction iam ut siet is unnecessary; siet is very seldom found in any place but the last.
520. istaec: fem. plur. $=$ istae-ce; cf. 766; Trin. 390 haec sunt aedes.
521. faxo... comederis: cf. 326 madebunt faxo, 562, 661. The future perfect has its full force ; 'I'll warrant you will find you have eaten...' Exit Pen.
522. satine: a surprised nonne; 'isn't it clear that . . . ?'; cf. 181 ; Epid. 666 satine illic homo ludibrio nos habet?
523. ita : probably not correlative to uti 522 , but $=$ ' in this way', i.e. as Pen. has done.
ludificant: the plural is justified by the notion of plurality in uti quemque conspicor. See on 192 quisquam qui impetrant, and cf. 779, 785.
ostium : of Erotium's house. The ancilla appears with further commissions for Men.
524. amare ait: sc. se. For omission of the subject of an infin. cf. 347,482 . The present infin. here represents the future indic. (amabo). On amabo followed by final clause see note on 425 .
525. hoc: she hands him the spinter (527).
una opera has here the meaning of una (cf. 536) in classical Latin; 'at the same time', i. e. as the palla. In this sense eādem opera $\bar{a}$ (lit. 'with the same trouble') is commoner; cf. Capt. 450. More frequently una opera is used with potential subjunctive in the sense '(you might) just as well' ; cf. 794. The line as it stands is unmetrical, and a word has evidently dropped out; see App. Crit.

COMMENTARY: LINES 510-43

526. pondo, 'in weight', an old ablative of pondus. In Cicero and Livy it appears as an indeclinable noun = librum (-as). On the hiatus see App. Crit.; but perhaps the archaic ablative-ending in $-d$ had a tendency to remain in fixed commercial and legal phrases ; cf. Amph. 193, where the correct reading may be praedad agrod adoriad. Cf. also our archaic phrase 'pounds sterling' (= Easterling, a reminiscence of the Hansa). See Introd. 7. IV. E. b.
527. spinter $=G k . \sigma \phi<\gamma \kappa \tau \dot{\eta} \rho$, from $\sigma \phi i \gamma \gamma \omega$, squeeze ; a bangle (i.e. close-fitting bracelet) worn on the left arm above the elbow.
nŏ́uŏm: predicative. For scansion cf. ď̆ŏm 542 ; see note there.
528. As Men. stares at the bangle in joyful surprise, the maid asks: 'Don't you know what bangle it is ?' Men. answers: 'I only know it's a gold one', which to him is the most important point; cf. 549. Scan scīn quĭd hŏc | sit ; see Introd. 7. I. A. b, and cf. 638 , $651,675$.
nisi aureum : sc. id esse scio.
529. numquam... factum est: numquam strong negative, as in our 'I never said so'. In his surprise Men. forgets his rôle, but soon remembers it (535), and almost overdoes it (536-7). Cf. 481 ff. Hiatus occurs at a pause ; see also App. Crit. Ritschl proposes te obsecro, unnecessarily; see Introd. 7. IV. D. a. iv, p. 55.
530. immo: corrective ; 'Yes, I do remember; to be sure, this is the one ', &c.
531. istuc stands in anticipatory apposition to the whole sentence; as used here it has the force of 'by the by', Gk. тo $\delta \epsilon i \nu a ;$ cf. 107 id quoque iam; 734; Stich. 589 illud quidem, 'I mean to say'. Men. here overdoes his part.
armillae : looser than the spinter.
532. nam has asseverative force, owing to an ellipse; ' (you're right), for of course . . .'
533. dicam curare? 'shall I say you're seeing about it?' Logically the tense of the infin. is correct; cf. the epistolary imperfect.

539-40. simul: 'dramatic' irony.
541. inauris is the generic term ; stalagmia ( $\sigma \tau a \lambda a ́ \gamma \mu a)$, 'drops', are the particular, variety she wants.
542. pondo dứŏm nummum, 'of two didrachms' weight': duom nummum gen. plur. ; cf. nostrum . . . socium, 134. For scansion cf. nŏuŏm, 527. Possibly both are to be scanned as monosyllables by synizesis.
543. She hints that he will have a friend at court if he does so. Cf. Asin. 183 seq., where Cleaereta mockingly describes the lover's anxiety to please all that dwell under the same roof as his mistress, including the lapdog; et quoque catulo subblanditur . . . se ut quom zideat gaudeat.

MENAECHMI

544. cedo : cf. 197, 546. Hiatus is justified by the strong pause (occurring at caesura) ; cf. 546, 737, 898.
545. da: sc. aurum.
sodes $=$ si audes : see on sultis, 350.
aps te $=$ de tua pecunia.
poste: archaic form of post ; cf. 838. Spengel proposes ego post, whereby 546 is a comic echo of 545 ; but contrast requires ego in the next line; here it is unnecessaly.
546. This line is added 'aside' for the benefit of the audience. While he is speaking, the maid exit into the house.
quique : here $q u i$ probably represents, not the old instrumental, but the locative ( $=$ so-called genitive of value) ; cf. 1159 quiqui ( $=$ quanticumque) licebunt; Pers. 661 qui datur, tanti indica.
547. Cf. Epid. 192.
548. fer pedem, 'step along '.
confer: Brix reads profer on the ground that conferre gradum means 'join or meet some one'; cf. Pseud. 707: but con- may also be an intensive prefix, as in concito, comminuo, &c.
549. ad laeuam : the spectators' right, the way to the forum; cf. 565-7. He himself goes R. towards the harbour to find Messenio, who is waiting at a waterside hostelry, 436 .
550. ut si[quis] : see App. Crit. It quis is retained, read sequatur with $P$, and scan ūt sĭquǐs | sĕquat for mixture of numbers cf. 522-3 uti quemque conspicor. . . ludificant. If quis is omitted, the subject is indefinite 'they'. Brix's original reading was manum ut $|\mid$ Si qui $|$ sequant $\mid u r$.
sequantur : so-called 'subj. by attraction'; cf. Rud. i128 ac si istorum nil sit, ut mini reddas. Nonius quotes the line as ut si sequentur. On this question of 'mood-attraction' see Lindsay, Syntax of Plautus, V. 29.
551. To the coniectures given in the App. Crit. add di mihi 〈hic〉, Ussing ; hic = in Epidamnus, contrary to Messenio's forebodings, 258, 343, 375. (See also Introd. 7. IV. G, p. 57.)

There is an echo of this speech in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, III. ii. ad fin.

I see a man here needs not live by shifts,
When in the streets he meets such golden gifts.
I'll to the mart, and there for Dromio stay:
If any ship put out, then straight away.
When Menaechmus II departs harbourwards the stage is empty, and the third pause in the play occurs. Soon Matrona (i.e Menaechmus I's wife) and Peniculus, who has fulfilled his threat of 518-19, come out of Menaechmus I's house.
559. frustra: sc. esse: 'to be hoodwinked'; cf. Amph. 974 et seruos et era frustra sunt duo: more usually 'to be mistaken'; cf. 692.
560. ubi uir compilet : final.

COMMENTARY: LINES 544-72

561. ea: referring to quidquid domist; cf. Poen. 505 qui, quidquid agit, properat omnia.
quin tu taces? See on 247-8. Her voice is penetrating; Pen. fears that Menaechmus will receive timely warning.
562. manufesto with opprimes.
563. Hiatus is perhaps due to the old ablative-ending $-d$; cf. 526: but see Introd. 7. IV. D. d. It is better to suppose that Pen. pauses for emphasis after each horrible detail.
564. Scan quằm hăb|ŭ̄it ; cf. 393 note, 695 quăm hăbĕ|as. For construction of eccam without a verb see note on $179-80$; contrast its use, 567.
565. em, 'thacre!'
uestigiis, 'by his traces' ; we should say 'in his tracks'.
566. eccum . . . retortitur: Menaechmus I enters L. as coming from the forum ; cf. 213,596 . So they arc ready for him ; cf. 562 . The hiatus is due to the natural pause after eccum coincident with caesura; so Most. 686.
567. male habeas: i. e. scold him. Warner tr. 'that which ye ever do ; bayt him for life '.
sic censen : assigned in old edd. to Matr. ; but she would hardly assent to Pen.'s iden quod semper, and sic censeo always introduces or confirms the speaker's own views ; cf. Cist. 769.
568. Cf. Asin. 881 aucupemus ex insiaitis clanculum quam rem gerant.
569. For the metres of the following canticum (571-603) see Schema Metrorum. The basis of the metre in 11. $57 \mathrm{I}-84^{\text {a }}$ is the bacchius ( $\cup \perp-$ ).
ut : exclamatory, as probably uti, 572.
maxume . . . moro: to be taleen together and predicativcly; see on 572.
moro: Greek $\mu \omega$ pós. A favourite pun of Plautus; cf. Poen. 379 huïus mores morosi malos; Tin. 669 mores hominum moros et morosos.
570. molesto atque multo: attributive; the sentence then runs: "How utterly foolish (is) this troublesome and tiresome fashion (that) we follow.' The reading of P is molestoque multum, to be taken predicativcly like maxume moro, 57I. Note the alliteration. For multo cf. 316.
uti quique sunt optumi : it is best to take uti as repeating $u t$ of 57 I , and quique as $=$ quicumque (cf. Asin. 404 quisque obuiam huic occesserit irato, uapulabit; Mil. 156, 160, 460): 'how especially is this custom practised by all our leading men'. Otherwise take uti quique sunt opt. together (cf. Poen. 486 ut quisque acciderat, eum necabam ilico), and suppiy ut exclamatory from 57 I.

MENAECHMI

574. clientes (=cluentes those who listen-and do not speak) were manumitted slaves, protected aliens, descendants of these two classes, and others, who attached themselves to some rich man as patronus; cf. the mediaeval baron's retainers. To have a large number of clientes conferred social distinction. Plautus frequently, as here, introduces allusions to Roman institutions and customs; the framework is Greek, the details Roman (e.g. 45I-9). Cf. Shakespeare's treatment of classical and other legends (e.g. the 'nine men's morris' and the Masque in MT. $N$. D.).
575. Construction: magis quacritur quoius modi res (clientum) clueat quam (quoius modi) clientum fides (clueat).
576. quo11s modi clueat, 'in what estimation it is held': clueo (like the cognate Gk. $\kappa \lambda \dot{\prime} \omega$ ) originally meaning 'hear ', acquires the sense 'hear oneself called, be named, be reputed'; cf. 854 ; Trin. 312 qui animum uincunt .. . semper probiores cluent. So audio in classical poetry : Hor. Epp.i. 7. 37 rexque paterque Audisti coram. For the sentiment cf. Juv. iii. 140 Protinus ad censum, de moribus ultima fiet Quaestio.
577. nequam habetur (sc. cliens) forms the apodosis. Scan sǐ ést (see Introd. 7. IV, A. a. ii, p. 51).
578. diues: substantival.
579. qui $=$ ii (clientes) qui. Scan qut $n$ nëc lëglés (cretics); so Sch. Metr.; but if the line is taken as a bacchiac with an extra syllable prefixed (anacrusis), the word-accent coincides with the rhythm: quī |nĕclèg aequom bonum : asyndeton is common in O. Lat., especially in legal and alliterative phrases; e. g. Rud. 839 ui uiolentia ; ibid. 882 oro opsecro.
580. sollicitos . . . habent, 'keep them in a state of worry'; not mere periphrasis. The explanation follows.
581. datum (sc. id esse), 'paid' (i. e. to themselves).
582. rem $=$ wealth.

584 ${ }^{\text {a }}$. Most edd. read mens êst ìn |quërélīs (bacchiac). Preads in quo ire Lis ubi, \&c., i. e. E of eis, 585, has been changed to $L$, and the last syllable of querelis omitted (haplography).
585. ubi dicitur dies, 'when they are cited to appear in court '.
simul patronis: under the early Republic a cliens could not plead in person, but was represented by his patronus in legal proceedings. See Willems, Le Droit Publique Romain, pp. 10-14, and cf. Hor. Epp. ii. I. Io4.
586. quippe qui . . . loquimur, 'who, if you please, plead in their defence'; sarcastic use of quippe qui with indic.; cf. Epid. 618 ST. habe bonum animum. EP. quippe ego quoi libertas in mundo sitast; Pseut. I274a. Brix, following P, reads quiippe qui proillis loqu(intur quae (mali) male fecerint (trochaic: Vahlen inserts mali); but quippe qui final is a doubtful usage.

quac....fecerunt: i. e. de iis quae fec., 'plead in defence of their dishonest acts'.
587. aut ad populum ... rest : the three principaltypes of legal cases at Rome: ad populum refers to criminal cases (causae publicae) tried before the comitia centuriata; in iure ('in the magistrate's court') refers (I) to civil cases (causae priuatae) settled summarily by a magistrate giving judgment on points of law when the facts were not disputed, (2) to a preliminary judgment by a magistrate on points of law in a civil case where the facts were disputed (the question of fact being tried in iudicio); ad iudicem ( $=$ in iudicio, 'before an arbitrator') refers to civil cases of the last-mentioned type, which were referred by the magistrate (after proceedings in iure) to an unofficial arbitrator who gave judgment on questions of fact. In a sponsio (see 590 note), as being concerned with questions of fact, the award was made by a iudex. Cf. Willems, pp. 316-24.
rést $=$ res est; cf. in|sanúst, 282, &c.
588. Scan clī̀ň quildam or clīens.
quod uolui agere: i. e. prandere.
589. attinit . . . detinit : the simple verb teneo had an archaic reduplicated perfect tetini, quoted by Nonius, 178, from Pacuvius and Accius; in compounds the first syllable would tend to disappear, owing to the throwing back of the accent (cf. rettuli $=$ anapaestic.

590. apud aedilis, &c. : the aediles had jurisdiction in iure in cases connected with trade, commerce, and money-lending; cf. Willems, p. 271. Under ordinary circumstances the aedile made a pronouncement on the legal aspects of the case, and appointed a iudex to decide on the question of fact; pending proceedings in iudicio the party in possession of the disputed property or money had to find sureties for the thing or sum disputed and for the mesne profits (prades litis et uindiciarum; cf. 593). Actual proceedings, however, might be avoided by a sponsio, which was a sort of legal wager to decide the question of fact : each of the opposed parties bound himself to pay an agreed sum if his statement were adjudged false by a iudex. The party who desired a sponsio challenged the other in a set form of words; e.g. si res de qua agitur mea est, sestertios xav nummos dare spondes? In this formula the siclause (condicio) was of course variable, and might in some cases be so ingeniously worded (cf. 591) as to put the challenged party in the wrong; while the refusal of the latter to accept the challenge, no less than failure to win the sponsio, was tantamount to a praciudicium (preliminary verdict). In this case Menaechmus, knowing that if the case proceeded in the ordinary way his client would not have a leg to stand upon (594-5), made desperate efforts to substitute a sponsio; efforts which were, however, frustrated by the folly of the client himself (593). The procedure was evidently per sacramentum; see Willems, p. 318. Metre requires eiius for eius.

591. condiciones ... confragosas, 'I proposed (a sponsio in) complicated and difficult terms'.
592. aut plus aut minu'... controuorsiam : some edd. take aut plus aut minus in the sense of plus minus (= circiter): 'I spoke on the matter in dispute pretty well as it was needful to speak'; cf. B.G. viii. 20. I non longizs plus minus octo milibus: but the use of aut . . . out seems to indicate a strong antithesis, and probably the meaning is 'either more or less than it was needful to speak'; i.e. he exaygerated some points and minimized others, in order to induce the aedile to allow a sponsio; he was guilty of suppressio ueri and suggestio falsi. See also Appendix, pp. 211-12.
ópŭs ěrăt | dícto: for ablative of perf. part. pass. with opus est cf. Amph. 505 citius quod non factost usus fit quam quod factost opus.
dixeram controuorsiam : on the analogy of causam dicere. Either scan dīxĕrăm | cóntro|uorsi|am (?) or read con|trơّrsi|am.
593. quid. . . dedit? ' what of my clierrs, who insisted on finding a surety?' i.e. letting the case proceed to a regular trial. Cf. note on 590. quidill': sc. fecit? i. e. 'wasn't he an unutterable fool?'
594. manufestum . . . teneri, 'plainly liable'. From this line to II32 the Ambrosian palimpsest is either lacking or undecipherable. See Introd. 8.
596. corrumpit, 'has spoilt it for me'; present tense, as the result of his action is still going on.
597. corrupi optumum : hiatus at the caesura of a short line must be regarded as doubtful ; Bothe reads corrupit, Vahlen corrupi ita; cf. the similar hiatus in 599, where Guyet reads primum licitum est. Note the rhyming half-lines 59,-600.

600 . These closing lines are spoken in the hearing of the wife and Peniculus.
601. Scan quă $m$ hŏdŭle: a trochaic line.
602. Peniculus and the wife converse aside. Scan uirŏ mé $\mid$ mălŏ măley; this line is anapaestic (like the next), and has a proceleusmatic in the third foot.
quid ais? 'what do you say to that?' The wife takes his question literally; cf. 138.
male, 'unfortunately'.
603. Men. is still unconscious that he is overheard. Scan mănĕ: măle ërlit; proceleusmatic in sixth foot. Cf. 602, and see for both Introd. 7. 1. B. b. ii, p. 44.
intro: into Erotium's house.
ubi mi bene sit, 'where I could have a good time'; cf. 62I, 626, 677; sometimes the verb is personal; cf. 485 bene fui, where see note.

COMMENTARY: LINES 590-6II

mane ... potius : still aside; mane = 'just you wait!'
604. ne: particle of asseveration, often joined with edepol (cf. I60), or, if a woman is speaking, with ecastor (cf. 6i4). Scan ne̛ zullan é|castor; there is hiatus at the diaeresis also.
illam = pallam. Matrona now confronss her husband.
faenerato apstulisti, 'you've stolen it at interest', i.e. ' you will pay dearly for stealing it'; cf. Asin. 902 ne illa ecastor faenerato funditat.
sic datur: either 'that's a good stroke', 'one for him'; or, taking do in this and similar phrases as having the meaning of $-d o(=\tau i \theta \eta \mu)$ in the compounds abdo, \&c., ' that's the way to do it', 'that's your style'. In any case it expresses malicious satisfaction ; cf. 628 , and see note on 472 opserua quid dabo. Cf. also Pseud. 155 ; Truc. 634 ; Stich. 766.

On the ground that the original order has been considerably disarranged by the copyists, Wagner reshuffles 11 . 604-40 in an arbitrary manner and totally without warrant. The result is a jumble far less intelligible than the conversation as given by the MSS.
605. pote: sc. esse ( $=$ posse): cf. Epid. 227 negant pendi potis (or pote), where, as here, the MSS. read potesse.
606. Menaechmus, thus taken by surprise, adopts a tone of innocent sympatiy. Not realizing that he has been overheard, or that he has a double whose actions have brought upon him the wrath of his parasite. he has no inkling of the coming storm.
win hunc rogem? Men. says this in a conciliatory tone, as not wishing to trouble her; hence her answer.
607. perge tu: l'en. eggs on the wife, as below, 6II.
609. quidam pallam-abstulit she is going to say, when Pen. interrupts her with a remark addressed to Men., who shows alarm at the mention of the palla. The use of quidam implies that the culprit is known.
quid paues? masks were not introduced on the Roman stage until the time of the great actor Roscius, a contemporary of Cicero ; before his time wigs and paint were used. The actor representing Menaechmus would here express alarm and perplexity by grimaces. See Introd. 4.

6Io. nisi... incutit: some edd, assign these words to Men. as an 'aside' ; but the next line is thus rendered pointless. Possibly Men. may have added them in a low tone intended for Peniculus's ear alone.
palla pallorem : play upon words. Warner, rendering quid paues?' Why do ye blush?', translates here: 'He cannot cloake his blushing'.

6II. at ( $=$ 'well') refers to Men.'s look of surprise when he realizes that Pen. is against him. The word justifies assigning the iatter part of 6Io to Pen.
ne . . . comesses, 'you should not have eaten up'; in past jussive sentences the imperfect subjunctive is always employed in O. Lat., probably as being the past of the imperatival pres. subj. ; e. g. ne comedas. Cf. Merc. 633-4 requireres, rogitares quis esset; so Verg. Aen. viii. 643 at tu dictis, Albane, maneres. In classical Latin the pluperfect is more common; cf. Aen. iv. 604-6.
612. non taces? for tense cf. quin taces?
non... taceo: the present is normal with non in an answer to a command or its equivalent ; cf. Stich. 92-3 PAM. adside hic, pater. AN. non sedeo isti.
nutat ne loquar: addressed to the wife. nutat takes the construction of a verb of command.
613. nuto ... nicto: nuto is a general term for making signs, but in a special sense $=$ sign with the head; nicto $=$ sign with the eyes (wink).
614. Kiessling places this line after 619 . It certainly seems out of place here, and 615 would follow 613 more naturally; 620 comes abruptly after 619, while it would be the natural continuation of 614 .
615. nihil hoc confidentius: a colloquialism; cf. 631; Cic. ad Fam. iv. 4.2 uictor quo nihil erat moderatizs. Confidentius in a bad sense.
quin, 'actually'; corroborative, as in 635,687 ; see 105 I note.
quae uides: his nodding, 612.
616. Scan dēosque by synizesis; cf. 655 , and see Introd. 7. II. c. Men. tries to draw a red herring across the trail by protesting his innocence of a minor charge.
617. credit . . . de 'isti': Pen. mockingly repeats the word used by Men.; 'she believes you now about "over there"; but go back to the other point.' This is the reading of Pradel, who takes isti as an adverb; it may, however, be dative in both places, no change to abl. being needed in the latter place, as it = the word isti. MSS. read istis, 'those words of yours'. Perhaps Men. used isti as a dative, and Messenio repeats it as an adverb for sake of contrast with illuc.
illuc: i. e. to the palla. Pcn. brings him back to the real point.
618. quó́ ĕgŏ | redeam? Men. uses redeam, as Pen. has just used redi, figuratively; Yen. pretends to take his question literally. The second foot is a proceleusmatic.
619. istaec, 'which you're talking about '.
rem . . . suam: her 'business', i. e. of making it unpleasant for Men. He says this in order to shame her to further efforts. After this line Kiessling places 614 ; see note there.
620. Menaechmus assumes the rôle of a dutiful and sympathetic husband.
621. responsant, 'answer back'.

COMMENTARY: LINES 611-38

inpune non erit, sc. illis.
nugas agis, ', you're talking nonsense', or 'you're making a fool of yourself'. The pitiless repetition of this answer to each of Men.'s hypocritical questions would be effective on the stage.
622. tristis . . . est : as if talking to himself in great concern. One MS. reads es. tristis $=$ 'upset'.
non . . . sati', 'not at all'.
623. familiarium, ' of the household'.
624. num ... saltem? 'at any rate you're surely not angry with me?'
626. mea uxor: Men. now tries endearments; hence blanditur.
bellus, 'the pretty fellow', 'your fine husband'.
627. num te appello? 'am I talking to you?' Men. tries to silence the parasite, and at the same time, in the hope of dividing the hostile forces, attempts to caress his wife ; hence aufer manum; cf. Amph. 903 (Alcmena to Jupiter) potin ut apstineas manum?
628. sic datur: see note on 604, and cf. 472.
properato : ironical exhortation: 'now go and...' So derideto, 629 .
comesse : infin. pres. of comedo, representing original comed-ese. Cf. comesses (imperf. subj.), 61 I.
630. huc : pointing to Erotium's house.

633: Scan mĭhi ĕssĕ: see Introd. 7. I. A. b, pp. 42-3. sinciput: cf. 506.
634. negabas: sc. te ; cf. 482, 538, &c.
aibas: cf. $A m p h .807$; $A \sin .208, \& c$.; contrast 532 above, aiebas. The regular termination of the fourth-conjugation imperf. indic. was originally $-i-b a m$ (-bam being connected with the root juseen in $f u i$ ); the form in -iebam, originally regular in verbs of the facio class, was extended by false analogy to fourth-conjugation verbs. See also note on scibo, 386 .
635. ut $=$ postquam. 'Why, it's only now at last that I'm getting back home after parting with you a while ago.'
636. noui ego te : referring back to 634 negabas me nnuisse, but with secondary meaning, 'I know what your word is worth'.
qui : instr. ablative: 'you didn't think I had the power' (or, perhaps, 'the spirit') 'to pay you out'.
638. eam ipsus [i] roga: see App. Crit. $i$ is bracketed here (as by Ritschl, who reads ēampsĕ| rógă ; perhaps rightly, as the sense required is 'ask her') on the ground that the three speakers were standing close together; but $i$ is sometimes used contemptuously without reference to actual motion; cf. Verg. Aen. ix. 634 i, uerbis uirtutem inlude superbis; in this use $i$ nunc (et) .... is very common; cf. Ovid, Her. iii. 26 i nunc, et cupidi nomen amantis habe. Omitting $i$, scan ĕam 别sū̄s | rơ̆gă quü̆d $\mid$ hòc êst retaining the order Ter. Ad. 917 illas abi et traduce. (Or perhaps in both cases scan first foot by synizesis ean ipsus.)

639. quasi tu nescias : sc. rogas ; but see next note.
$639^{\mathrm{a}}$. This line is an anticipation of 645 (where the MSS. reading is, as here, surrupta est tibi; see note there). Its presence here is probably due to the error of a copyist, whose eye glanced from nescias 638 to scias 644 with the result that 640-4 were omitted in his copy. When the error was corrected, instead of $640-4$ being replaced after $639,640-5$ were replaced after $639^{2}$. There is no need to suppose that $639^{2}$ has usurped the place of an original line now lost; if it is omitted, Matrona's speech runs quasi tu nescias me rogas? (indignant question), while the actual disclosure of the offence is thus artistically postponed a little longer.
640. Scan ŏ hŏminnem; hiatus is usual after interjections ending with a vowel ; lntrod. 7. IV. D. a. i. For exclamatory accus. cf. Bacch. 759 o imperatorem probum!' Most. 1071 o mortalem malum!

64 I . non potes, &c.: addressed to Men.
642. nil pudet: sc. te; in O.Lat. pudet and other impersonal verbs (as paenitet, oportet) were sometimes used personally, the subject being a neut. pronoun or pronominal word, or n. pl. adj.; cf. Epid. 107 idne pudet te . . .? Ter. Ad. 754 non te haec pudent? It is, however, possible here to take nil as adverbial accus.
643. t $\overline{\text { ua }}$ uoluntate $=$ sponte tua .
prōfiteri : first syllable long; but cf. Capt. 480 prŏfitetur. So Plautus varies between prơficscor and proficiscor (e.g. Trin. 149 pröfecturus). Profiteor is used of voluntary confession.
ades: sc. animo, 'attend'; cf. Merc. 568 prius hoc ausculta atque ades.
645. surruptast mihi? Men. cunningly pretends chagrin at the loss; what has been stolen from his better half has been stolen from himself as paterfan:ilias. MSS. have tibi (cf. $639^{\text {a }}$ ), evidently the correction of some dull copyist, rendering the next line pointless; mini is restored by an unnamed scholar quoted by Lambinus.
646. uiden ut. . . captat? addressed to Matrona ; the rest of the speech is addressed to Men.
captat, 'tries to take you in', i. e. by a sophistry; so in Amph. 422, 795.
647. salua non foret: i. e. as it now is safe (apud phrygionem). Camerarius's alteration of non to nunc spoils the sense.
648. nil . . . est: haughtily, to Pcn. (cf. 323).
sed... ais? with polite interest, to his wife ; cf. 626-7.
periit: used as passive of perdo; cf. 655 perdam.
649. Note ille emphatic, with first syllable long and bearing strong ictus )( illam unaccented.
650. quis is homo est? MSS. have hic for is, contrary to usage (cf.

COMMENTARY: LINES 638-64

factum : the verb is omitted, as the expression is exclamatory; cf. 338.
651. quî́s ǐs Mĕnaechmust? spoken with an air of the most egregious innocence.

Scan tič ǔtīc ; so in 653, 937. For istic emphasizing second person cf. Amph. 366, 575.

653-4. noctuam . . ' 'tu tu': this nectuo is our tawn owl (syrnium aluco), popularly called brown-, wood-, or hoot-owl. Its note is popularly represented by 'tu-whit, tu-whoo'; this is the owl whose melancholy hoot we hear at night in well-wooded districts of our isles. The Romans represented its note as tutu (pron. too too), whence a verb tutubure was formed. The Greeks called the bird тит́ ; cf. Welsh cwudihzw, German Uhze, and Ausonius Idyll. ed. Weber xii. de litt. monos. 8 Cecropiis ignota notis ferale sonans U . 655. Cf. 616.
656. non dedisse: sc. me. It would perhaps give more point to print a dash after dedisse ; i. e. to suppose that Men. was going to say non dedisse dono (cf. 657 non condoncui), and that by interrupting him, Pen. made his perjury appear grosser.
nos: sc. adiuramus nos. The comma should follow, not precede, nos.
657. condonatui $=$ dono dedi; but see 689.
sic, 'just ', 'merely': the word would be accompanied by a gesture ; cf. 197, 1028 ; Cic. pro Rosc. Am. 26.71 non sic nudos in flumen deicere.
utendam dedi, 'lent'; cf. Asin. 444 scyphos quos utendos dedi; Aul. 96 utenda uasa . . rogant, 'ask the loan of'.
658. equidem . . . tūam: emphatic.
chlamydem: a man's extra outer garment, corresponding to a woman's palla: 'cloak'.
do foras . . . quoiquam utendum, 'lend to anyone out of the house'.
pallium : a man's ordinary outer garment in a fabula palliata; cf. I30 note.
661. faxo referetur : colloquial construction ; cf. 326; contrast 539-40 faxo referantur.
ex re tua... feceris, ' you will find you have done so to your advantage', i. e. 'you had better do so'. Cf. Asin. 538 si quidem ex re consultas tua.

quando quem auctionem facturum sciunt. Exit Matrona into her house.
665. domi with nihil est.
666. cum uiro cum uxore: he shakes his fist at Men.'s house and says, 'curse you' (uos $=$ the household), 'husband and wife and all'; cf. Verg. Aen. iv. 605 natumque patremque Cum genere exstinxem. For the form of expression cf. Poen. 588 cum eo cum quiqui ('at all events').
ad forum: where he will try to secure a new victim.
667. excidisse : used metaphorically of missing or losing something one regarded as certain ; cf. Ter. Andr. 423 erus. . uxure excidit, 'has been disappointed of a wife'. Exit Pen.
668. exclusit: generally used of a mistress refusing to admit a lover ; cf. 671 ; here literal.
670. si tibi displiceo : he apostrophizes his wife, who has gone into the house, 664.
patiundum: spoken in a tone of mock resignation, to imply that it is not so very hard to bear.
at: used after $s i$ here and 746 in the sense of 'at least ', 'at any rate'. So at . . . tamen in classical Latin.
673. redimam, ' will buy instead' ; cf. 680.
heus ! used to attract attention. Scan heuts! ec|quís hicc ēst.
674. aliquis euocate: for plural verb with singularpronoun cf.192, 779, 785; Merc. 910 heus! aliquis actutum huc foras exite; Ter. Ad. 634 aperite aliquis actutum ostium. Here it may be explained as a case of partial apposition to the subject ; 'call her out, one of you'.
675. Scan quừs hǔc mē and quăm aêtati (but see App. Crit.). On the hiatus see Introd. 7. IV. A. b. ii, p. 52.
aetati tuae $=$ tibi; cf. Rud. 374 uae capiti atque aetati tuae! Propert. i. 2. 31 nostrae gratissima uitae ( $=$ mihi).
676. It was necessary for everything to take place outside the houses, i. e. on the stage. See Introd. 4, p. 17.
677. quid est quod: quod adverbial = propter quod; cf. 762; Most. 69 quid est quod tu me nunc obtuere, furcifer? Epid. 570.
tibi... sit uolup: uolup is an adverb, standing for uolupe as facul, simul, for facile, simile; it is cognate with Gk. $\bar{\epsilon} \lambda \pi o \mu a t$ (root FE $\lambda \pi-$ ). The word usually has a bad sense ; cf. Asin. 942 hic senex si quid clam uxorem suo animo fecit uolup. For this colloquial use of an adverb with esse see 485 note, and cf. Mil. 747 si illis aegrest mihi id quod uolup est.
679. eam repeats pallam illan; colloquial pleonasm; cf. Poen. 1069 pater tuos, is erat frater patruelis meus.
rem omnem, ut factum est : colloquial constructio кatà $\sigma \dot{v} \nu \epsilon \sigma \iota \nu$ : cf. Truc. 851 ut factumst fecit omnem rem palam: in a similar phrase, 519, the concord is observed.
ordine, 'from beginning to end'; with resciuit. Cf. Verg. Aen. iii. I 79 remque ordine pando.

COMMENTARY: LINES 664-87

680. bis tanta pluris, 'worth twice as much'; one would expect tanto, but one MS. ( $\mathrm{B}^{1}$ ) here, and all MSS. in 800 (multo tanta ... amplius) read tanta; cf. Rud. 521 multo tanta miserior; Stich. 339 multo tanta plus ; Cic. Verr. II. iii. 97 quinquies tanta amplius. Probably the word thus used is a technical expression employed in arithmetic or commerce. Havet suggests that there is an ellipse of pecuniā ; i. e. here bis tantā pluris $=$ bis tanta pecuniā pluris, lit. 'at a larger price by twice as much money', i. e. 'twice as expensive'. This explanation fits the expressions used here and in the passage of Cicero quoted above; the phrase multo tant $\bar{a}$ with a comparative, which occurs in the other passages quoted, and which is found in late authors (e.g. Appuleius, Met. vii. I5 ; x. 21 ), seems to be a popular extension of the usage by false analogy.
quam uoles: either with bis tanta pluris; or take quam as indef. relative (not only is it to be more costly, but she can have the feminine pleasure of choosing it herself). Brix ${ }^{3}$ reads quom.

68 I . út ferrés: contrast férres in next line. For change of accent due to difference of grouping cf. $28 \mathrm{I}-2$, and see note on $32 \mathrm{I}-2$.
682. fieret nouom $=$ reconcinnaretur ; cf. 527 .
683. mihi tu ut dederis pallam ...? 'What? you gave me the mantle ?' ut with the subjunctive is thus used in indignant questions rejecting a thought or statement as absurd or untrue ; sometimes it is joined to an interrogative particle, as Curc. 616 mean ancilla libera ut sit, quam ego numquam emisi manu? The usage is found in classical Latin, e.g. Cic. Cat. i. 9.22 te ut ulla res frangat? tu ut umquam te corrigas? Cic. Tusc. ii. 18. 42 egone ut te interpellem? The construction is sometimes explained as due to an ellipse of fierine potest ; and here it would be possible, though less idiomatic, to take ut dederis as dependent on factum (esse). See also 299 note, and Lindsay, Suntax of Pl., p. 66.
numquam . . . reperies: see 533 note, and cf. Poen. 762.
684. postquam, 'since'. Replace the colon at end of line by a comma.
685. nunc: sc. primum.
postillac ( $=$ postilla ; for form cf. posthac) repeats colloquially the post of postquam. (Not in Lewis and Short.)
quam rem agis, 'what you are driving at', 'what your game is '.
686. quia commisi, &c.: either (1) take ut me defrudes as depending on commisi: 'because I have given you an opportunity of cheating me'; or (2) take quia commisi absolutely, 'because I was trusting', and make ut me defrudes explanatory of ad eam rem. The latter interpretation gives more point to the next line, and has a parallel in Aul. 574-5 scio quam rem agat; ut me deponat uino, eam adfectat uiam. Bothe suggests quae commisi; i. e. ut me defrudes (eis) quae (tibi) commisi.
687. Men. imagines that she means he is now trying to get the things from her.

MENAECHMI

688. nec te: Erotium interrupts him, mockingly echoing his neque edepal te.
ultro with oraui; she was not the one to mention it first.
689. Scan dědて̌̌sti ēlam; but see App. Crit. Shortening is justified by elision of final syllable : see Introd. 7. I. A. a. i, p. 42.
690. patiar : in a sarcastic tone of resignation. She will put up with it, as she must; but she will not forget it.
tíbĭ habe, aufer : the hiatus, if allowed, should probably come after tibi; see note on 389. Guyet proposes habe tibi. We may also scan tz̆bi hăbĕ, | aíffer (hiatus at pause).
691. in loculos: sarcastic exaggeration; cf. Hor. Epp. ii. I. 175 gestit enim nummum in loculos demittere.
692. ne frustra sis: this common phrase may be taken either as a prohibition ('don't make any mistake', 'be assured of that'), or as final, i. e. '(I tell you) in order that you may not deceive yourself'. Cf. Capt. 854, &c.
693. habes despicatui: the latter word occurs only here and Cic. pro Flacco 27. 65 si quis despicatui ducitur. Plautus makes very free use of the predicative dative, especially of verbal nouns of the fourth declension; cf. 695 frustratui; Poen. I281 ludificatui; Cist. 365 remque nostram habes perditui et praedatui.
694. frustra, 'for nothing ', 'fruitlessly ' (Irom her point of view). She implies, however, that she will not sacrifice business to revenge.
ductare $=$ domum ducere (meretricem) ; cf. Poen. 868 ductas gratieis; Asin. 164-5, 169. It is wrong therefore to take frustra ductare as = frustra habere ('cheat'). Ritschl suggests frustra's, me ductare non potes.

695. nimis iractunde: sc. est: 'Gad, she's tremendously angry at last'. For this use of the adverb cf. Merc. 583 pulcre ut simus, and see 485 , note. Seyffert reads hercle iraciinde to give the latter word its usual accent: but possibly when the last syllable was elided the accent was thrown back (iracund').
heus tu: cf. 673. Erotium is just disappearing into the house.
696. etiamne astas? etiam ( $-n e$ ) is joined with second person pres. indic. in impatient commands or despairing requests; cf. Trin. 514 etian tu taces? Here 'won't you stop?'
etiam audes, 'won't you be good enough . . . ?' For dropping of second -ne cf. Pers. 474 sumne probus, sumlepiutius ciuis? and for this use of audes cf. sodes ( $=$ si audes), 'please'.
697. exclusissumtus, 'utterly out in the cold'; comic formation; cf. Aul. 633 uerberabilissume. Warner renders vividly: "Now I am everie way shut out for a very bench-whistler.'
698. hanc rem amicos: for double accusative cf. Cic. Att. vii. 20. 2 nec te id consulo. Here there is also an object-clause, quid...

censeant. The departure of Menaechmus I is merely a device to clear the stage for Menaechmus II; a short pause here. Men. I has gone off L. (to the forum) ; presently Men. II enters R., from the direction of the harbour, where he has been vainly searching the quay-side taverns for Messenio.
703. aliquo . . . in ganeum : cf. Ter. Ad. 359 credo abituctum in ganeum aliquo. Warner tr. 'I feare he is fallen into some lewd companie'.
704. prouisam, ' I'll look out to see '. She is just stepping out of her door.
quam mox with subj. after verb of expectation $=$ ' how long it will (would) be before . . .; cf. Livy iii. 37. 5 exspectabant quam mox ... comitia eaicerentur ; Cic. liosc. Com. I5. 44 quid exspectas quam mox ego dicim? In direct questions, quam mox is always followed by a present tense in Plautus; cf. I53; Rud. I412.
707. accipiam, 'give him a reception' (a warm one). Warner : ' I will go ring a peale through both his eares.'
709. flagitium hominis: see 489 note.
710. quae te res agitat? agitat is a strong word ; cf. Verg. Aen. iv. 471 scaenis agitatus Orestes; Aut. 642 larmae hunc . . . agitant senem. Tr. 'What (spectre) is harrying you?' (in reference to 708-9; he thinks she is the victim of hallucination). Brix changes the MSS, order (quae res te) in accordance with Plautine usage; cf. Curc. 92 ; Merc. I34, &c.

7 Io-II, etiamne ... audes? not as in 697, but ‘do you actually dare . . .?' The real Simon Pure seldom plucked up courage to 'answer back'.
713. For hiatus before interjectional phrase and at pause see Introd. 7. IV. D. a. ii, c. i, p. 55.
audaciam : for exclamatory accusative cf. 640. The same phrase occurs Ter. Heaut. 313.
 Cic. Tusc. iii. 26. 63 Hecubam autem putant propter animi acerbitatem ... fingi in canem esse connersam; Juv. x. 27 I-2 torua canino Latrawit rictu quae post hunc wixerat uxor. The leyend was perhaps invented to account for the name Cynossema (Kuvós $\sigma \hat{\eta} \mu a)$.
715. Graii, the Greeks of heroic or classical times )(Graecult, the degenerate Greeks of a later age (cf. Juv. iii. 77-8 ommia nouit Graeculus esuriens). Graeci is the ordinary geographical or ethnographical term.
717. omnia mala, ' all kinds of abuse '.
quemquem aspexerat: sc. in eum (quemquenn): ut quemque asp. would have been more in accordance with Plautus's ordinary usage.
718. coepta appellari est : with a passive infinitive the passive of coep $i$ is regular.

MENAECHMI

Canes: archaic form of nominative; cf. Trin. I72; Phaedrus ii. 4.2 feles.

7 Ig. istaec, 'that you commit'. Ritschl, to avoid hiatus after égo, reads nōn égo ğs sutzaēc tüăă; for this tautology cf. 721, 735, 738. See, however, note on 389.
720. aetatem : acc. of duration, 'all my life'; cf. Asin. 274 aetatem uelim seruire: see also 675 note.
uiduam : used of a divorced woman ; cf. 113.
Hiatus here and 11. 737, 739-40, possibly marks utterance checked by sobs ; see App. Crit. on 740.
721. The line repeats 719 and is itself tautological (istaec... tua... quae tu facis); a natural symptom of anger and agitation; cf. 735, 738.
722. quid id ad me: sc. attinet? cf. Poen. 1021 quid istuc ad me? id anticipates the following pair of alternative questions, of which the first lacks an interrogative particle ; cf. Rud. IIO6 id. . . seruae sint istae an liberae.
te nuptan : sc. esse, 'endure married life'.
725-6. non ... patiar ... quin : lit. 'I shall not endure not to...'; the quin-clause is due to the sense of non patiar, which $=$ nil me impediet; cf. Ter. Heaut. 761-2 non possum pati quin tibu caput demulceam.
726. quam . . . perferam : for ellipse of potizs cf. Rud. III4 tacita bonast mulier semper quam loquens. So 969 below quam $=$ tamquam. Subjunctive of rejected alternative; cf. 332 potius quam ... astes, 1059; or perhaps perferam is fut. indic.; see note on 332.
727. mea . . . caussa, 'for aught I care'; cf. 1029. Gk. $\boldsymbol{\epsilon}^{\prime} \mu \circ \hat{v}$ $\gamma^{\prime}$ '̃̀ $\nu$ ека.
728. dum with fut. indic. = quamdiu; cf. 93.
729. at mihi negabas, &c.: the omission of the object seems curious; see App. Crit. Niem. reads ät mǔzhi hănc (cf. 732). This statement is not consistent with Men. I's words, $655-7$, but such inaccuracy is natural on the part of an angry woman; Ritschl, however, reads haut for at, while Ladewig and Fleckeisen, followed by Wagner, completely disarrange the MSS. order of 11. 729-41. Brix ${ }^{5}$ supposes that Matrona made an attempt to snatch away the palla, which Men. frustrated; hence at. Take mihi with surrupuisse.
732. Scan tūn tĭbi hănc; see Introd. 7. I. A. b. and cf. 1072.
734. istuc : in 'anticipatory' apposition to the following sentence, drawing attention to it; 'look here!' Cf. 107 id quoque iam, 536 istuc.
736. i, Decio : she calls to a slave within the house.
737. ut ueniat: Langen, followed by Brix ${ }^{5}$, holds that quaere here $=$ quaese ('ask': for constr. of quaeso see Bacch. 179) ; but it is probably better, with Sonnenschein, to take ut ueniat as final, and quaere as 'try to find'.

COMMENTARY: LINES 718-52

ita rem esse: almost 'that it is necessary'; lit. 'that there is profit in so doing'; cf. 66I ex re tua ...feceris (Capt. 296 tua re $f e c$. .), and the phrase in rem alicuius, 'to one's profit'. On the double hiatus see App. Crit., and note on 720. Cf. Introd. 7. IV. C. b and D. c. i, d, pp. 54-6.
739. pallam: probably the hiatus should here be avoided by reading with Vahlen pallas, plural of exaggeration or of generalization, as 796 uiros, 803 pallas; in the latter line $\mathrm{B}^{2}$ has pallam.
740 . On the second hiatus see App. Crit., and note on 720 . Cf. Introd. 7. IV. B. b and IV. D. d, pp. 53, 56.
741. fabulor: in allusion to fabulas 724.
742. quod bibam: i.e. an antidote or a prophylactic.
743. qui possim, 'to enable me'.
744. quēm tứ hơm|ĭnēm|〈med〉: Ritschl inserts med before hominem, but the hiatus after tú is regular: Introd. 7. IV. A. a. i.
arbitrere: MSS. have arbitrare, corrected by Luchs on the ground that elsewhere Plautus invariably uses subjunctive in a clause dependent on nescio. See Sonnenschein's Rudens, notes on 356, 385.
745. simitu . . cum, 'just as well as', ironical; cf. 748 noui cum Calcha simul. Possibly the meaning is: 'I made your acquaintance on the same day as Porthaon's'; cf. 749. simītu is said to be a compound of the I.-E. root sem- (= one), and itu, abl. of verbal noun ïtucs ( $=$ going) ; cf. Stich. 743 simitu exissem zoobiscum.

Porthaone: Porthaon was the grandfather of Hercules' wife Deianeira. The name is chosen here as that of an obscure mythological character.
746. at pol, 'surely at least '; see note on 670.
748. illum here and in 746,749 , is emphatic, as the scansion shows ; 'do you know him?' (ironically).
cum Calcha simul; see note on 745. In view of 749, probably noui is here at any rate to be taken as aorist ; cf. 299, 501. Calcha, heteroclitic form, for usual Calchante; cf. Chremem, -is, side by side with Chremetem, -is, in Terence. The name of Calchas (the aged seer of the Greeks before Troy) is chosen here as that of a doting greybeard.
749. $\overline{\text { ē }}$ dem die : cf. $539-40$ simul.
750. The parallelism of the two halves shows that the meaning is ' Do you deny knowing my father just as you deny knowing me ?', and partly accounts for the double iambic ending, on which see further Introd. 6. II. A. f. iii, p. 29.
751. dicam : fut. indic. corresponding to si uis adducere ( $=$ si adduces) in the protasis; cf. our use of auxiliary 'will' to form futures.
752. pariter ... soles : elliptical, = pariter hoc (facis) atque alias res (facere) soles; cf. 766 ita istaec solent; Bacch. 203; Stich. 530.

MENAECHMI

753. The Senex has entered L.. 1. 747, and now totters slowly across the stage to the centre, where his daughter and Men. II have been conversing ; by the time he reaches his daughter (775) Men. has moved away r. (cf. 777). As the Roman stage was very long (cf. Introd. 4, p. 17), there was plenty of time for him to deliver this canticum as he approached. The halting, rather jerky, bacchiac metre suits the old man's gait. See Schema Metrorum.
ut aetas mea est, &c., 'as (far as) my age allows, and in so far as it is necessary to do so'.
hoc usu' facto est: usus est takes the same construction as opus est; hoc may either agree with facto, as Rud. 398 iam istoc magis usus factost, or be nom., as often with neuter pronouns in these phrases; cf. Amph. 505 citius quod non factost usus fit quam quod factost opus. For abl. of pass. partic. used thus cf. 592.
754. progrediri: so Bothe alters MSS. progredi, on metrical grounds; for the form cf. Cas. 862 progrediri; Pseud. 859 progredimino. Consonant-stems with the -YO suffix gave rise to two classes of verbs; in one, $-\stackrel{\imath}{c}$ predominated (third-conjugation verbs in $-i o$ ), in the other, $-\bar{i}$ - prevailed (certain fourth-conjugation verbs). In O. Lat. the two classes were not clearly differentiated. It is possible that we should here retain the MSS. reading and take the first syllable of properabo as long (cf. prōfteri 643 ; see note there, and Lindsay, Lat. Lang. p. 590 § 45). The line would then run gradiom prō|ferăm, prôlgredí pröperábo, and we may suppose that each repetition of pro- was accompanied by a step forward with the aid of the scipio (856).
755. consitus: cf. Cat. 64. 208 caeca mentem caligine Theseus Consitus; Verg. Aen. viii. 307 ibat rex obsitus aeno.
756. onustum : sc. senectute; cf. Merc. 671-3.
757. mers: this word also appears in the forms merx, mercis, merces (cf. frux, frugis, fruges, stirps, stirpis, stirpes, &c.). In these and similar cases the longer forms are the earlier (cf. Cas. 380 sortis). In popular speech $x$ and hard $s$ seem to have differed little in sound, to judge by forms appearing in late inscriptions such as milex, ariex, conius. See Ritschl, Opusc. ii. 652-6.
ergo is often used thus when a sentiment is repeated: 'yes (after all) it is a bad business'. Edd. take it here as $=\epsilon_{\epsilon}^{\prime \prime} \gamma \varphi$, and quote Mil. 1043, where, however, it has its usual meaning of 'accordingly' if we accept the conjecture deus for heus at the beginning of the line.
758. res . . . pessumas is taken as a single expression, and hence can be qualified by another adjective without et ; cf. 66 maxumam malan crucem, 849 .
759. longu' sermost: indicative (in spite of si autumem) as in the phrase longum est dicere, where we should say 'It would be tedious'. The length of the tale is represented as actually brought to the test ; cf. Cic. pro Archia, § 15 difficile est . . . confirmare.

761. in...corde: an inversion of Homer's катà фрє́va kaì кaтà өu дóv. Cf. Merc. 590.
763. irem: regular sequence, as expetit is aorist-perfect.
$763^{\text {a }} \cdot$ mihi certius facit $=$ me certiorem facit ; cf. 242 certum qui faciat mihi.
$763^{a}-4$. quid uelit: dependent on certius facit, but amplifying quid id sit. Lambinus continues the construction by reading quid uelit, quid me accersat.
767. postulant $=d \dot{\xi}$ ıoi $\sigma \iota . \quad$ Cf. 794, 796.
dote fretae: his daughter was dotata; cf. 6I. For the sentiment cf. Epid. I80 AP. pulchra edepol dos pecuniast. PE. quae quidem pol non maritast; Hor. Od. iii. 24. 19 Nec dotata regit uirum Coniunx. Mommsen ascribes the abuse of wives, especially rich wives, which is a feature of Roman Comedy, to the Catonian opposition to the growing emancipation of wives from their husbands' manus or marital power. Wives were beginning to manage their dowries de fucto, though de iure a married woman had no property of her own.
768. haud ... saepe are not to be taken together: saepe qualifies, the whole sentence; 'in many cases', 'it often happens that . . '
769. modu', 'a limit'.
quoad, 'up to which (and no further)'. It is implied that a wife ought to put up with a good deal. quoad in Plautus is not temporal, but is the relative corresponding to adeo (' to that point'); cf. Asin. 296 quoad uires ualent.

770-1. A general statement.
77 I . commissi. . iurgi: partitive genitives depending on quid; caussa: sc. arcessendi, 'without some fault or quarrel's being at the bottom of it'. Hiatus after second foot; but see App. Crit.
772. eampse : cf. 179-80 eapse eccam exit, and see note there. eampse is found also Aul. 814 ; Cist. 17o. In classical Latin the old form of declension survives in the Ciceronian word reapse ( $=$ re eāpse), e.g. ad Fam.ix. I5. 1.

773-4. See App. Crit. for various ways in which the line has been scanned. Taking it with Lindsay as a trochaic octonarius, read as bacchiac, the rest as an iambic clausula; cf. Capt. 783-4. The scansion $\overline{\text { enus }}$ gives either a dactyl in the fourth foot before diaeresis, which is not allowed, or a dactyl followed by an anapaest, which is very rare ; see Introd. 6. II. E. b, d, D. f, pp. 52-3.

tristem: predicative.
775. appellabo hanc and ibo aduorsum are 'asides'.
776. saluen $=$ saluisne rebus? 'Do I come (to find) all

777. destitit: here and in the corresponding line, 810 , desisto is used in its original sense of 'stand aloof' ; cf. Most. 787. Lambinus prefers to read distitit from disto. Men. II has walked away to the right, really to look out for Messenio.
778. uelitati : a verb derived from uelites, light-armed troops attached to a legion, skirmishers; so we say: 'You've had some sort of a skirmish.' Cf. Cic. ad Fam. ix. 20. 1 scurram uelitem ; Asin. 307 $\mu \in \nu=$.
779. uter meruistis : a natural colloquialism ; so we carelessly say: 'Have either of you seen it?' Cf. 674, 785, 1105, 1119 ; Epid. 259 quod laudet is ... uterque.
paucis: sc. uerbis; cf. Verg. Aen. iv. 116 paucis (aduerte) docebo.
non longós logos: cognate acc., non going closely with longos (hence not ne), 'no long rigmarole': logos is contemptuous; cf. Stich. 221, where a parasite, selling his stock-in-trade, says logos ridiculos uendo: a foreign word is adopted as slang; cf. Christopher Sly's paucas pallabris.
780. nusquam $=$ mulla in re.
hoc primum : adverbial.
te apsoluo, ' I settle your business', i.e. 'set your mind at ease'. The word is sometimes used of money payment ; cf. Epid. 466 te apsoluam brewi.
781. hic: she points to Men.'s house.
durare: sc. hic; 'continue'; cf. Amph. 882 durare nequeo in aedibus.
782. proin tu: see 327 note.
quíd îstūc . . . est? 'What's your trouble ?'
ludibrio: cf. Shakespeare, Com. of Err.11. i. 101: 'Poor I am but his stale' (i.e. laughing-stock). Warner uses the same word here.
783. mandauisti $=$ in manum dedisti, here in legal sense of manus (marital power).
784. The hiatus perhaps is justified by his deliberate preaching tone; but Ritschl's id edixi is reasonable (haplography).
785. ut caueres: colloquial neglect of strict sequence, edixi being true perfect ; contrast $787-8$ monstraui. . . ut . . . geras. See Lindsay, Syntax of Plautus, V. 10, pp. 56-7, for numerous instances of a similar kind.

with shortening of monosyllables ending in long vowels; cf. 786; Introd. 7. IV. A. a. i, p. 51. The three indirect interrogative clauses depend directly on opserues, $i d$ being redundant. For the sentiment cf. 115.
790. at enim, 'but indeed', introduces an objection of the speaker ; not, as in classical Latin, a supposed objection which the speaker disposes of.
hinc. . . ex proxumo: to be taken together, 'next door to this (my) house'; hinc = a me.
sapit, 'shows sense '.
791. ŏb is itanc industriam, 'owing to that diligence of yours', i. e. in spying upon him ; 'for your pains'; cf. 123-4.
faxo amabit, ' he'll love her all the more, I'll warrant '.
794. una opera . . . postules: the subjunctive is potential; 'you might just as well claim'; cf. 796-7 ; Most. 259 una opera ebur atramento candefacere postules. For postulo in this sense cf. 767, 796.
ad cenam ... promittat, ' accept an invitation to dinner'. Cf. Stich. 596 ; Cic. De Orat. ii. 7 quod ad fratrem promiserat. The phrase arose on the analogy of ad cenam uocare.
795. accipiat, 'entertain'. Scan ăpū̆d se with hiatus at the diaeresis.
seruirin $=$ seruire-ne : unaccented $\breve{e}$ is weakened to $\breve{i}$; cf. 928 facilin: so quippe unde inde make quippini undique indidem.
796. uiros: generalizing plural ; cf. 803-4.
pensum : as if he were a female slave ; cf. next line.
797. inter ancillas, &c.: perhaps an allusion to the story of Hercules and Omphale. Spinning and weaving were among a Roman matron's chief duties ; cf. the picture of Lucretia, Livy i . 57.9, and the laudatory epitaph on a Roman lady's tomb: Domi mansit ; lanam fecit.
cārĕre: from the same root come carmen (carding instrument for wool), carminare, and carduus (teasel). Gk. кєi $\rho є \iota$.
798. non equidem : sarcastic ; 'it seems I did not . . .'
799. hinc $=a m e$, ' on my side', $\mathrm{i} . \mathrm{e}$. as an advocate stands by his client ; cf. Rud. 1409 huc $=$ huic.
illim $=$ illinc (here for $a b$ illo) : cf. Poen. 455.
800. multo tanta... amplius: multo is pleonastic; on tanta see 680 note.

melius . . . est, 'you had better'; see IO9I note.
sanam, 'sensible'; in an emphatic position.

MENAECHMI

One MS. reads pallam, but cf. meretrices in next line. See also note on 739 .
domo (not domi) through the influence of ex arcis; cf. 740.
804. Scan $m \overline{e a}$ orn- by synizesis.
805. istuc, 'what you accuse him of'.
806. quae ... insimules: causal; subjunctive used as the case is hypothetical.
807. spinter: cf. aurum, 739, 803; ornamenta, 804. How did she know this? Probably Men. II was displaying the trinket conspicuously, just as in all innocence he was carrying the pallit; cf. 730, 739.
hanc: she points to Erotium's house.
8o8. scibo. (ibo): hiatus at diaeresis coincident with pause in sense. ibo, restored by Camerarius, dropped out through haplography. On the form scibo see note on 386 .
809. istuc . . . quod . . . dissertatis,' the subject of your dispute'. One good MS. (D) has the stronger word discertatis.
812. qua | dé re aut | quóóus rĕ $\bar{i}^{1}$, 'concerning what matter, or of what fact in all the world (do you offer them as witnesses)?' The redundancy of the expression marks the old man's astonishment at Men.'s solemn exordium.
813. neque : the corresponding neque does not appear; owing to Matrona's interruption, 814, Men. starts afresh, 815, and confirms his new asseveration by an imprecation.
814. deierat? ' is he taking oaths (again)?' Matrona is thinking of the other Menaechmus's oaths, 616,655 . She was standing apart (cf. 810, 822), and could hear their words only imperfectly. Schöll proposes peierat; see App. Crit.

815-16. penetraui 〈pedem〉: cf. 400.
820. ǎīs: cf. 487.
821. tu negas? &c.: cf. 631.
uero... inuere: Men. uses uero in the ordinary adversative sense: ' in truth I do deny it '; Senex counters with 'no, it's not in truth that you deny it ', i. e. you're lying. MSS. have ludere, which Lindsay regards as an error for luuere, i. e. inuere (found nowhere else, but possible in sense of haud uere). Ritschl reads ludicre; Niem., incorporating a suggestion of Schöll, non uere. With either of latter two readings there is no hiatus at diaeresis.
822. nocte hac, 'last night'; to-night $=$ proxima nocte. Perhaps with the suggestion 'in your sleep'.
824. non tu [te] tenes? 'don't you grasp that?' The -te is due to dittography; a dactyl in the seventh foot is inadmissible.
825. hanc rem gere, 'attend to the business in hand ')(alias res agere $=$ to pay no attention. Cf. Pseud. 195.
826. To fill the lacuna at end of line Leo suggests quid debeo (which would also complete the sense of 827); cf. Poen. 1233; Bacch 884-5 numquid debetur tibi? quid illi molestuis?
827. molestiaest $=$ molestiae est (predic. dat.). See App. Crit. 828. Scan ưaděn tu illic.
uirere: see App. Crit. Ritschl reads liuere; but cf. uiridis . . . colos; a greenish hue would indicate excess of bile, which the ancients regarded as a cause or concomitant of madness; cf. Hor. A.P. 301 o ego laeuus Qui purgor bilem sub uerni temporis horam!
829. ut . . . scintillant, tide! For these symptoms of madness cf. Capt. 594-6 ardent oculi . . . uiden tu illi maculari corpus totum maculis luridis? atra bilis agitat hominem. So Ben Jonson, The Silent Woman, iv. 2 : 'Lord, how idly he talks, and how his eyes sparkle! He looks green about the temples; do you see what blue spots he has?'
831. quid mihi meliust quam . . . adsimulem: without ut, cf. Rud. 328 quid mi meliust quan ... opperiar? The subj. in these cases may be hortatory ; cf. Rud. 377 capillum promittann optumumst, lit. 'Let me grow my hair long-'tis best so'. quam ut is more usual ; cf. Rud. 220 quid mihi meliust . . . quam . . . ut secludan?
praedicant: i.e. by their enumeration of his symptoms. There is no need to mark a lacuna here with Ritschl, or to follow Acidalius in placing 843 after $829-30$, and $831-2$ after 834 . Men. speaks these two lines aside, and immediately begins his pretended paroxysm with aiarming contortions and grimaces; hence Matrona's exclamation, 833, and her father's advice, 834 .
834. quam potest: MSS. have potes, for which cf. 435.
835. euhoe $=$ eioì: cf. Hor. Od. ii. 19. 5, 7. See App. Crit. Men. now bursts out into wild Bacchic cries, followed by threats which constantly increase in violence until 869.

Bromie: an epithet of Bacchus, 'the noisy one', in reference to his noisy revel-bands ; cf. Eur. Bacch. I4I.
quo ... in siluam: cf. 703 aliquo ... in ganeum.
837. femina ... canes: cf. 714-18; for the form canes, 718. For the expression cf. Truc. 284 musca. . . femina.
838. poste : for this old form of post, corresponding to ante, cf. 545, 1090 .
hircus talust : see App. Crit. Lindsay thinks that alus may be an adjective ('rank-smelling') cognate with ālium, garlic. Niem. imagines a compound hircosălius (hircus, salio), i. e. 'trisky goat', but hircosălus would seem to be the proper form; cf. Bacch. 362 crucisălum. Müller's hircus caluos seems an absurd combination; and Senex is grey, not bald, 854. Madness displays, not inconsistency, but the idée fixe. It is, however, inconsequent ; cf. next line (unless Dionysus's trial before Pentheus is there referred to). Schöll suggests squalus ( $=$ squalidus), used by Ennius (ap. Non. 172. 20).
840. capiti : perhaps here in special reference to his affliction;

841. illic: dat. $=$ matronae ; cf. 828.
lampadi[bu]s: a heteroclitic form lampada (= lampas) is found in late Latin, and may have been a popular form ; cf. Calcha ( $=$ Calchante) 748 , cassida $=$ cassis, &c. lampadibits is not impossible ; cf. Verg. Aen. iv. 64 pectoribúus inhians, and see Introd. 7. III. c, p. 49.
842. minatur . . . exurere: after verbs which are normally followed in Latin by acc. and fut. infin. it is quite usual to find in Plautus pres. infin., the subject of the infin. being omitted; cf. 938 minitatu's prosternere; Trin. 5 si quidem operam dare promittitis. In these cases the infin. has the function of a verbal noun, the object of the introducing verb; here, e. g. 'he threatens me with burning out of eyes'. At this point Matrona begins to run off the stage; her father follows, to stop her.
843. This aside is perfectly in place here; their terror, which he knows to be groundless, seems so ridiculous to him, that he begins to think they must be mad.
ultro: here in its etymological sense, 'on the other side'; it has the same force as our 'the boot's on the other leg'.
844. heus! cf. 673. He calls his daughter back, as a new idea strikes him.
quid si. . . cito? ' what if I summon?' i. e. ' hadn't I better ?' The subjunctive is more usual: e. g. Poen. 330 quid si adeamus?; Capt. 612 quid si adeam hunc insanum?
845. abducam: i.e. from the house.
hunc hinc : cf. Mil. 377 quo modo haec hinc huc transire potuit. Senex is prevented from carrying out his intention by Men.'s tactics ( 848 seq.). Men. gets rid of the woman first, as he knows that the old man will be easier to hoodwink ( 872 seq.).
846. turbarum . . . amplius, 'any more disturbance'.
ampliūs : cf. 327 longiūs. The quantity is less remarkable here owing to the pause ; possibly it may be a case of syllaba anceps.
enim: asseverative; 'I am in a fix'. These words and the next line are spoken aside; in 848 he breaks out again.
847. ni occupo, 'unless I'm beforehand with some plan', i.e. carry it out before they can carry out theirs. Cf. Hor. Sat. i. 9. 6 'numquid uis?' occupo.
ni occupo . . . auferent: Lindsay (Syntax of Plautus, VIII. 5, pp. 125-6) points out that in threats to which a condition is attached Plautus uses the pres. indic. in the protasis with nisi (ni), but the fut. perf. with si. Cf. Mil. 828 periisti iam, nisi uerum scio with Men. 416 periisti, si intrassis intra limen. It is supposed that this distinction corresponds to the distinction between the tenses usually employed in commands and prohibitions; Lindsay sums up: 'Thus aliquid: adjectival ; cf. Truc. 425.

848. pugnis . . . parcere, 'to be sparing with my fists'.
uotas $=$ uetas; cf. Asin. 789 uotitam. He is addressing Apollo.
huiius $=$ Matronae.
849. malam magnam crucem: found only here; the usual expressions are in malam crucem, in maximam mal. cr., in malam rem. Sonnenschein contends that mala crux forms a single idea, and if qualified, cannot have its parts separated by an adjective (yet cf. res plurumas pessumas 759, where see note). He reads here magnam malám crucem. On double iambic ending see 328 note.
851. amabō, ādserua: see note on 382 . On hiatus following parenthetic word (here at diaeresis) see Introd. 7. IV. D. a. iv, p. 55852. sumne $=$ nonne sum.
quae ... audio: indicative of fact in causal clause. audio here means 'live to hear', as uideo sometimes means 'live to see '; cf. Livy iii. 67. II Esquilias uidimus ab hoste prope captas. Matrona now exit.
853. haū măle îl láánc amoui ; (amoueo): Lindsay adds the last word. Bothe, reading d me amoui; nunc, &c., and Leo, reading hau male, Apollo, illanc amoui; nunc, &c., suppose an anacoluthon in what follows, hunc . . . Titanum being taken up by huius, 855. hau male, 'cleverly'.
854. Titanum : Men. pretends to regard the Senex as one of the Titans warring against Apollo. Not perceiving that the combination tremulum 7 itanum is a comic absurdity purposely introduced, most edd. follow Meursius in altering to Tithonum (the husband of Aurora, cursed with immortality without immortal youth).
qui . . . patre: quoted thus by Priscian, probably from now missing part of A ; P has Cucno prognatum patre.

Cygno: because of the Senex' white hairs. More than one mythological character was changed into a swan as a punishment for blasphemy. Ritschl restores Cücino, as being what Plautus wrote: $y$ does not appear in Latin versions of Gk. words till Cicero's time; for the form cf. techina $=\tau \in \chi \downarrow \eta$, \&c.
855. huius: metre requires liuizus (disyllable).
artua: a neuter form of the plural of artus, found only here. Cf. pecura, tonitrua. On gender variation in O. Lat. see 168 note.
857. si attigeris: see note on 847 ni occupo.

858-9. Addressed to Apollo.
ancipitem: here in its original meaning (ambi+stem of caput), two-headed; i. e. 'double-headed axe', in classical Latin bipennis.

MENAECHMI

hunc senem ... dedolabo . . . uiscera: apposition between whole and part.
859. osse fini : apparently fini is used as a preposition (=tenus) ; cf. Cato, R. R. 28. 2 postea operito terrā radicibus fini. Possibly, as Lindsay suggests, the phrase was originally an abl. abs. losse fini, lit. 'the bone being the limit'). In classical Latin fine is used prepositionally with genitive (cf. again tenus), e.g. Ovid, Met. x. 536 fine genus uestem ritu succincta.
assulatim: cf. Capt. 832. Hiatus at the diaeresis; see also Introd. 7. IV. D. d, p. 56.
uiscera: everything inside the skin and outside the bones; 'flesh '.
860. Scan énitm $u$ ū|ro.
illud: what he threatens. Senex here begins to edge away; hence Men. must drive him down ( 862 seq.).
861. ut minatur: quasi-causal, 'considering his threats', 'such are his threats '; cf. Ter. Ad. 389-90 DE. eho an domist habiturus? sy. credo, ut est dementia.
faxit: subjunctive (originally optative) of S-aorist. Cf. Mil. 283 dixis, 316 empsim.
864. uetulum . . . edentulum : diminutives of contempt.
865. astiti in currum : 'pregnant' construction.
iam stimulum : in manust: the punctuation of the present text gives a staccato effect which interrupts harshly the rapid rhythm of 863-4, 866-7. If stimulum is to be taken as a second object of teneo, it is better (with Brix) to read iam stimulum in manu, and to suppose that est was added by an ignorant copyist who took stimutum for a neuter noun in the nom. Possibly, on the other hand, there was such a neuter variant of stimulus (cf. 168 nasum $=$ nasus $)$, and we should read iam stimulum in manust : so Lambinus.
866. appareat, 'be plainly heard'. Warner tr. 'Hait' (= gee up) ; 'come ye wilde jades make a hideous noyse with your stamping : hait, I say'.
867. inflexa sit: the force of the perfect is 'be quite bent'; the line means: 'Take heed that your tireless limbs bend themselves double in swift trot', a vivid expression to indicate high-stepping action. Cf. Verg. Georg. iii. 192 simuetque alterna uolumina crurum. Note the mock-tragic diction (pedum pernicitas) and alliteration.
868. mihin . . . minare? Men. is probably prancing about like a horse, and the Senex is trying to humour him ; cf. Hor. Sat. i. 5. 56-8.
869. qui stat, ' who stands his ground', i. e. does not run away like the Matrona. Sonnenschein's suggestion qui astat is unnecessary.
870. capillo ... deripit: just as Pallas prevented Achilles 182

COMMENTARY: LINES 858-82

from attacking Agamemnon; cf. Hom. 1l. i. $197 \sigma \tau \bar{\eta} \delta^{\prime}{ }^{\circ}{ }^{\circ} \pi \iota \theta_{\epsilon \nu}$
 Senex, Men. adopts the device of falling down in an assumed fit; at the same time he maintains his rôle of madman by pretending to attribute his sensations to supernatural agency.

87 I . tuom ... Apollinis: the genitive stands in apposition to the possessive pronoun (which is equivalent to a genitive) ; cf. Cic. Phil. ii. 43. III turm hominis simplicis pectus; Eur. Hec. 430 and partly metri gratia. Men.'s voice gradually grows fainter as he delivers this line, and at the end of it he collapses.

872-3. Most edd. mark a lacuna as in text; it is supposed that some generality has dropped out (e.g. Niem. suggests ita nunc hic iacet Miser. nihilist uita hominum) which is illustrated by the particular example introduced by uel ('for instance') in $11.873^{\text {a }}-4$. But surely eu . . . durum is itself a generality ; there is no need either to mark a lacuna or to adopt the faulty scansions criticized in the App. Crit. if we read with Hare : eu morbum hercle acrem ac durum! di, uostram fidem! Vel hic, \&c.: 'Gad, how violent and severe a disease (this madness is) ! Heaven protect us (from it)! (Look at) this poor madman, for instance-how strong he was a little while ago!' A further objection to the present text of 1.872 is that stress is thrown on ac.
$873^{\text {a }}$. uel = 'for instance' ; cf. 1042; Ter. Hec. 60 ; Cic. ad Fam. ii. I3. I sed suauis accipio litteras, uel quas proxime acceperam, quam prudentes!
875. Here exit the Senex; but the break between scenes should come at 88I, where see note.
877. ut ualidus insaniam? neither the accentuation uăludư̆s nor the scansion uălüdūus can be justified (see, however, note on 841): longiūs, 327 , is no parallel, as its final syllable was originally long. See App. Crit. Brix's suggestion improves sense and metre; with Bothe's proposal uesaniam cf. his proposal uesania (subst.) 921 ; but neither verb nor substantive is found in the Dramatists; the verb, indeed, appears once only in Catullus; nowhere else before the sixth century A. D.

879-81. For the comic device of a direct appeal to the spectators cf. 1000, 1157 ; Amph. 376; Aul. 406, 715-20; Cist. 678; Most. $280-1, & c$. It is a favourite trick of Aristophanes ; cf. Vesp. 74 seq. where actors distributed among the audience take part in the dialogue, as in a modern Revue.
881. For ni $=n \bar{e}$ see note on 419-20. Here Men. II goes off R., just before Senex, returning from the doctor's, enters 1. ; the break between scenes should therefore occur here. See Introd. 4, p. 19.
882. sedendo . . . spectando: i.e. waiting in the consultingroom, and looking out to see whether the doctor was coming : the gerunds are instrumental. The hiatus may be justified by the antithesis.

883. manendo: modal, = dum maneo.
ex opere, 'from his rounds'.
884. odiosus: predicative ; almost = 'swaggering'.

885-6. Medical men in the Rome of this day were mostly Greek immigrants; the first Greek physician came to Rome about the beginning of the Second Punic War (Pliny, H. N. xxix. I. 6). As many of them were pompous charlatans, they were frequently satirized by the Comic Dramatists. Here Plautus is laughing at the habit (not unknown to-day) of certain doctors of boasting about their aristocratic clientele. The joke is pointed by the fact that Aesculapius and Apollo were the gods of healing. Scan $\overline{a_{\bar{z}}}$.
887. fabrum : there is no need to suppose that the Senex, by a humorous error, takes Aesculapio, Apollini as referring to the gods' statues ; the joke is more simple ; the doctor has boasted of mending legs and arms, and the Senex says: 'I'm wondering whether l'm to say I'm calling in a doctor or-a joiner.' Scan either Brix suggests medicum me dicam ducere (medicum has dropped out before me dicam, and been restored in the wrong place).
888. incedit: incedo is used of slow and deliberate walking, e. g. Aul. 47 ut incedit, followed by the threat testudineum istum tibi ego grandibo gradum; cf. Asin. 705 ; Amph. 330 , &c. It is also used of pompous or dignified gait ; cf. Mil. 872; Truc. 463 ; Verg. Aen. i. 46 dizoon incedo regina, 405 uera incessu patuit dea.
moue . . . gradum : not addressed directly to the doctor.
formicinum : in reference not merely to his slow pace, but to his mincing and affected gait; Muretus remarks here : formicae multum quidem mouent, sed parum promouent. The doctor makes a great show of bustle, but does not make much actual progress.
889. dixeras: pluperf. referring to their previous conversation. Scan quǐd ĕsse illli.

890 . lārŭātust: haunted by laruae, or ghosts of wicked men, whose visitation was supposed to cause madness. Cf. Aul. $\mathrm{S}_{42}$ laruae hunc atque intemperiae insaniaeque agitant senem. For the form cf. lymphatus = visited with madness by nymphae. Laruatus is always four, larua three syllables in Plautus. Tr. 'hagridden'.
cerritus: probably $=$ cereritus, driven mad by the influence of Ceres: cf. Amph. 775-7 quin tu istanc iubes Pro cerrita circumferri? . . . laruarum plenast. Preller's derivation from cerus (in Carmen Saliare; $=$ creator) is needless, as Cerus is the masc. form of Ceres (Sanskrit $\sqrt{ }$ kri-, to make).
891. ueternus, 'coma'.
aqua intercus (i. e. inter cutem), 'dropsy'. Warner, displacing the order, translates 890-1 : 'Is it a letarge or a lunacie, or melancholie, or dropsie?
894. mea . .. fide, 'on my honour'. Such promises are part of the quack's stock-in-trade.
895. The Senex does not like the doctor's airy perfacile: he wants to be sure that great pains will be taken. The doctor therefore rushes to the other extreme, 896.
896. Both the reading and the interpretation of this line are questions of great difficulty. (1) Niem. retains sescenta, taking it as agreeing with suspiria understood (cognate acc.); he also adopts an arrangement suggested by Lindsay, and transfers ita (897) to the end of this line, reading at the beginning of 897 ego illum (latter word as in MSS.). He scans thus: in diès: |ztă || ego zllutu. This will give the sense: 'Why, then, I'll heave scores of (painful) sighs each day, such great pains I'll spend you over his treatment'. For in dies distributive cf. 457 ; sescenti is the usual expression for a vaguely large number. (2) Ritschl arranges 894-6 thus : $896,895,894$. In this line, embodying suggestions of Scaliger (sospitabo) and Camerarius (sescentos), he reads quin sospitabo plus sescentos in die, 'why, I'll cure six hundred (such) a day', which thus continues the casual tone of perfacile idquidenst. This gives good sense, but shows little regard for the MSS. (3) Palmer, in an Appendix to his edition of Amphitruo (p. 253), suggests keeping Ritschl's order, and reading quin subus piabo plus sescentis in dies (referring to expiation by sacrifice of swine); but (a) the swine had to be ten days old, not sues ( = full grown swine) ; cf. note on 290 ; (b) this reading would render 895 (the next line according to Ritschl's arrangement) pointless; (c) the religious act had to be performed by the patient, and is to be distinguished from the medical treatment by hellebore; cf. 913, 950 ; Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 164-6. (4) Lindsay's suggestion sescenta sexies (a comic exaggeration of sescenta, to be taken as (I) above) is a likely solution; see App. Crit. for source of error.
897. tibi: ethic dative.
899. peruorsus : lit. 'wrong way round'; everything has turned out exactly contrary to his wishes; the day has 'gone awry'. Cf. Cicero's word-play, pro Cluent. 26. 71 ut erat semper praeposterus atque peruorsus, initium facit a Bulbo.
901. flagiti, 'disgrace'; for genitive after compounds of -pleo cf. Aul. 454 ; Amph. 470 ; the ablative is more usual ; cf. Cist. 127 me complewi flore Liberi ; Cas. 123 ; Merc. 795.
902. meus Vlixes: the parasite is compared to Ulysses as being a cunning accomplice in rascality; perhaps there is also a reference to the estrangement between Agamemnon and his wife, and Ulysses' services to the former in the matter of the sacrifice of Iphigenia (cf. Eur. I. in A. 524, 1361).

MENAECHMI

regi : a flattering title often bestowed by a cliens upon his patronus; cf. Asin. 919; Ter. Phorm. 338 ; used here also in allusion to Agamemnon. Scan sū̄o ; cf. mē 905.
903. Scan quĕm ट̆aŏ | hớminēm; to avoid these hiatuses, Müller inserts hodie (frequent in threats) before hominem; but for hiatus after pyrrhic not bearing ictus cf. 1061, and see Introd. 7. IV. B. a. ii, p. 53 : the first hiatus is quite regular.
si . . . uiuo, 'as sure as I'm alive'; cf. Aul. 573 ; Bacch. 766 ; Pseud. 1325. The future si uiuam is also used in this form of asseveration, as Most. 4. The apodosis is always in the future. Cf. the similar variation between si sapis and si sapies. Note the alliteration.
euoluam, 'unwrap from ', and so 'strip of'.
904. illius esse : sc. untam; referring to uitur. . . sua, 903. The point of this line lies in the double meaning of uita (life, livelihond); Menaechmus says in effect: 'The meals he consumes, which to him are uita, are really mine; I'll deprive him of his sole possession, namely, the breath he draws.'
905. educatust: cf. 98.
906. condigne, 'just as badly', i.e. as Peniculus; used similarly Aul. 465.
907. palla : outside its clause, and therefore emphatic. Men. I knows that the palla is a sore point with Erotium, though he is ignorant of the real cause of her annoyance.
908. Scan eŭ | édĕpōl! | nĕ ĕgo. uiuo : emphatic for sum; cf. 202. Or perhaps: 'It's a wretched life I lead.'
909. The Senex and the Doctor have thus far remained hidden (cf. 898), but catch Men.'s last words. After this brief conversation aside, they suddenly advance to Men., to whom the doctor is known (cf. 957).
se miserum praedicat: a symptom of melancholia.
910. qur . . . bracchium? Men. has accompanied his last words (908) with a gesture of declamation, and so displaced his robe.

91 I . nunc tuo : not redundant with isti, but $={ }^{\text {' }}$ which you're now suffering from'.
mali with quantum.
912. quin ... suspendis? Men., already in a state of high irritability owing to his mysterious misfortunes, naturally treats this new nuisance with impatient rudeness, which is regarded as a further proof of derangement.
ecquid sentis? 'do you notice anything (wrong with him)?' Hildyard ingeniously suggests that the doctor, under cover of shaking hands, or perhaps under pretence of putting Men.'s robe straight ( 910 ), has surreptitiously felt Men.'s pulse; and that the Senex, perceiving the manœuvre, asks: 'do you gather anything (from the state of his pulse)?' This would make excellent sense, and give additional point to Men.'s exclamation. Hildyard quotes Tac. Ann. vi. 50 medicus . . . per specien officii munum complexus pulsunn uenarum attigit.

quidni sentiam? 'of course I do'; quidni ( $-n i=n e i$, i. e. $n \bar{e}$ in the O. Lat. sense of non) is thus used in answers with the verb of the question repeated in the corresponding tense of the subjunctive (potential) ; cf. Mil. 923 ; normally in tmesi, as Mil. il20 PY. itan tu censes? PA. quid ego ni ita censeam? So frequently cur non? Cf. quippini? 948.
913. ellebori iungere: (1) the correction of $\mathrm{B}^{2}$, unguine, is accepted by Wagner and by Brix-Niem.; but hellebore, the traditional remedy for madness, was administered in the form of a draught, not of an ointment; cf. 921 potionis, 950 elleborum potabis; Hor. Epp. ii. 2. 137 ; Pers. iv. 16; Auson. Ep. 4.69 rest of the MSS. give iungere, which Lindsay retains (supposing a nom. iunsus= $\zeta \epsilon \hat{i} \gamma$ 万s $)$, in the doubtful sense of 'wagon-load' ( $\zeta \epsilon \hat{v} v o s=$ yoke of oxen, and so, by metonymy, what they draw). Similarly (3) Schöll proposes iumento in the sense of 'wagon-load' (cf. Plato, Euthyd. 229 в $\in \lambda \lambda \epsilon$ Rópov ä $\mu a \xi($ ) ; but iumentum is nowhere else so used, and even iugum and quadrigite, though they sometimes mean 'wagon' or 'chariot', are never like ámaga used in the sense of 'load'. (4) Leo's suggestion, with the same meaning, uno onere, is better. (5) The conjectures iugero (Sonnenschein) and iugere (Ital., from a supposed heteroclitic singular of iugerum) give the best sense ('an acre of hellebore'), and require a very slight alteration only of the MSS.; the error may have arisen through dittography of $u$.
915. atrum : Italian natural wine was very dark.
quin $t u$ is, $& C$. . : this line is quoted with a different ending in a note on Curc. 242 by a later hand found in the margin of B ; see App. Crit. The words suggested by Lindsay may easily have dropped out through similarity to the beginning of this line.
916. As it stands in the MSS. this line will not scan; it can be made metrical by bracketing tu (see App. Crit.) and scanning primuülŭum. Vahlen and Schöll mark a lacuna, which Niem. fills thus: primŭulum. (quin tu mihi \|id respondes quod rogaui?) MEN. quin tu me $\langle d\rangle$ interrogas, \&c. Some such words may have dropped out owing to quin tu occurring near the end of three consecutive lines. On the scansion primuullum see Introd.7. I. E.d. insanire primulum, 'to show the first faint signs of a (coming) fit of raving ' ; cf. 921, 934.
917. purpureum . . . puniceum, 'dark-red . . . bright red '.
esse : cf. 628 comesse. The original form was ed-(ĕ)-se; cf. surrexe, Hor., which is strictly a present, not a perfect, infinitive.

1ūteum : from lūtum, 'yellow-weed' )( lüteus from lŭtum, 'mud'.
918. squamossas: Plautus did not write the word thus, as no consonants were written double till Ennius's day; but the form given here by the MSS. indicates that the adjective-suffix -ōsus was originally -onsus (cf. formonsus), or rather -uent-tos, where

919-20. deliramenta loquitur: cf. Amph. 696; Capt. 598.
92I. percipit: sc.eum ; in its original sense, 'gets a thorough grip on him'; cf. Amph. II 8 horror membra . . . percipit. Contrast 916 occeptat . . . primulum. The use of indicative here after priusquam, though the idea of purpose is present, may imply that the Senex believes the fit is almost upon him ; cf. Verg. Aen. iv. 27 ante, Pudor, quam te uiolo. For the lengthening of the final syllable cf. 759 aduent̀t, 1101 emerzss: Bothe proposes percipit uesania, but see note on 877 .
922. occīdis fabulans, 'you're boring me' (or, 'him') 'to death with your jabber'; or, if occidis is used vividly for future, 'you'll be the death of me', \&c. Perhaps it is best to supply me, not eum, as the object; the Senex is weary of the quack's pseudoprofessional interrogatory, which he thinks quite unnecessary after what he himself has seen (cf. 835 seq.) : he wants the man to do something; cf. 921, 946. In $\mathrm{B}^{1}$ the words are assigned to Men., perhaps rightly.
923. duri: probably of appearance, 'staring', 'set in a fixed stare', referring to the glare of a madman.
924. locustam, 'lobster', which has staring prominent eyes; cf. Pliny, H. N. xi. 37.55 locustis . . . praeduri eminent (oculi).
925. enumquam . . . crepant: Warner tr. ' Doo not your guttes gripe ye, and croake in your belly ?'
926. nulla crepitant: nullus in agreement with the subject is used (as a rule colloquially) as a strong negative; cf. Rud. 143 ill' qui wocauit nullus uenit; Trin. 606 at tu edepol nullus creduas; Cic. Att. xi. 24. 4 Philotimus . . . nullus uenit; Verg. Aen. iv. 272 si te nulla mouet tantarum gloria rerum.
927. pro insano, 'like a madman'; cf. 945, 298 pro sano; Capt. 542 proque ignoto me aspernari.
928. facilin . . . cubans? repeats the former question in a more definite form ; 'do you sleep easily' (i. e. without bad dreams such as visit the insane) 'when you are in bed?' Ritschl makes this a distinct question by reading obdormis, with the sense 'do you go to sleep easily ' (i. e. readily) ' when you go to bed ?'; but cubo does not seem to bear this meaning elsewhere.

931-3. qui $=$ utinam ; cf. 45 I note.
There is no need to suppose a lacuna after 930 ; Men. suddenly realizes how foolish it is to answer these absurd questions seriously (cf. percontator); the recollection of his predicament returns, and he bursts out with a curse at his tormentor.
934. insanire occeptat, 'his fit is really beginning'; contrast 916.
de illis uerbis, 'in consequence of'; cf. 266 iam aps te metwo de uerbis tuis. Niem. takes the phrase with insanire occeptat, in the sense of 'judging by those words'.
935. Nestor : the Homeric King of Pylos, famed for wisdom and eloquence.
de uerbis: not as in 934, but 'in the matter of', ' with regard to'; cf. Most. 569 quid de argentost? ; Pseud. 123 ; Caecil. (I 61 Ribbeck) nil peccut de sauio. Or possibly it may be taken as 'judging by his words '.
praeut ... fuit: lit. 'in comparison with how he was', &c., i. e. 'compared with what he was a while ago', referring to Men.'s speeches, 835 seq. For praeut see note on 376 ; cf. Mil. 20.
937. dixti insanus, 'you said it in a mad fit'; dixti is Leo's correction of MSS. dixi, which Schöll retains, arranging thus: MEN. quid ego dixi? SE. insanus, inquam-, the speech of the Senex being interrupted by Men.'s exclamation. Niem. adopts Schöll's arrangement, but reads insanu's, which, however, is inconsistent with 935.
938. Ritschl marks a lacuna after this line, which Vahlen fills thus: ME. quis se dicit haec me facere uidisse aut quis arguit?

939-40. haec ted arguo: sc. fecisse. Note hiatus at the diaeresis combined with emphasizing anaphora.
941. coronam ... Ioui': proverbial expression for a daring and outrageous crime; cf. Trin. 84 ; Hor. Sat. i. 4.93 mentio si quae De Capitolini furtis iniecta Petilli Te coram fuerit. Men. answers the seemingly absurd charges made against him with charges still more absurd and violent ; cf. 945.

943. ès: always long in Plautus.
sub furca: the furca was a heavy wooden yoke, shaped like a $V$ or II, which was fastened on the neck of a delinquent slave, his hands being bound to the arms of the implement, which projected in front over his shoulders. Sometimes the victim merely had to walk through the city bearing the yoke, and proclaiming his fault as he went; sometimes his progress was rendered more painful by the application of rod or lash; cf. Livy ii. 36. I seruom quitam pater familiae. . . sub furca caesum medio egerat circo; Cic. Diuin. i. 26. 55.
946. face: for the form cf. 948, Io14; Aul. 153; so duce, Aul. 452 ; dice, Capt. 359. Fac is also found, e.g. 890 above; Trin. 1008.

MENAECHMI

947. quid facias optumumst? lit. 'what you must do, it's bestr' i.e. 'what you had best do?' The arrangement is paratactic, as usually with oplumum est, the subjunctive being jussive; see note on 831, and cf. Asin. $44^{8}$; Epid. 59 ; Aul. 567 tum tu idem optumumst Loces ecferendum; similarly with iustumst, Bacch. 994 (MSS.) ; certumst, Aul. 676.
948. ad me, 'to my house'; so also 952, 956.
face uti deferatur: more commonly $u t$ is omitted, e.g. 890 fac sciam.
quippini $?=$ quippe $n i$ (i. e. quippe non, see 9I2 note ; for the weakening of the vowel see note on seruirin 795) has the same sense as quidni, but is rarely followed by a verb, while the latter rarely stands without one ; cf. 912, IIO9.
949. meo arbitratu, 'just as I please'; cf. 9I.
950. aliquos gives a tone of vagueness to the phrase, as we say 'some three weeks'; cf. Pseud. 321 ut opperiare hos sex dies aliquos (but hos without aliquos generally refers to past time; cf. Io4 hos dies multos): the usage is colloquial ; cf. Cic. ad Att. iv. 4a. I welim mihi mittas de twis librariolis duos aliquos. Warner translates here: 'Oh, Sir, l will make yee take neesing powder this twentie dayes' (cf. German Nieswurz $=$ hellebore) ; to which Men. answers: 'Ile beate yee first with a bastanado this thirtie dayes.'
951. pendentem: when slaves were flogged they were sometimes suspended to a beam by the hands, a weight being attached to their feet; see the locus classicus, $A \sin .303-5$. The object of this detestable cruelty was to prevent their struggling. Men.'s threat is an insult, as it implies that the physician is a slave; many physicians in Rome actually were slaves, and, if skilful or popular, were a source of great profit to their masters.
952. prónde ut: lit. 'in proportion as'; tr. 'considering the degree (violence) of madness I perceive (in him)'.
953. immo: corrective. The doctor is ready with a plausible excuse.
954. quibu' paratis: for abl. of passive partic. with a pronoun in agreement after opus est, cf. Pers. 584 opusnest hac tibi empta? so perhaps with usus est, 753 , where see note.
955. ferant: for paratactic subjunctive with iubco cf. Most. 930 curriculo iube in wben ueniat; Rud. 708; so syntactic subj. (introd. by $u t$ ), Amph. 205; (alone), Epid. 627.
Scan eritt; cf. 921 percipitt, and note. Perhaps syllaba anceps.
The Senex and the Doctor now exeunt. Men., not suspecting what is in store for him, since $11.946-9$ and $952-6$ have been spoken out of his hearing, decides to remain where he is (965).
956. This line can be scanned only by taking the second foot as a proceleusmatic. Müller transfers nunc to the next line, there reading quod nunc me (see App. Crit.), and here ábiit médicus (natural rhythm). Socrus, suggested by Lindsay, occurs as a masc. noun in two fragments of archaic Latin.
957. quíd illūic | est quod: more emphatic than quid est quod, on which see 677 .
hisce: a Plautine form of the nom. plur. masc., used before a vowel or $h$; cf. illisce 997.
958. neque pugnas . . .coepio: i. e. nor even am I quarrelsome or litigious (signs of nervous irritability). The present-stem of coepio ( $=$ co- $i p-i o$, where -ip- is a weakened form of the root $a p-$ found in apiscor ; cf. adt-ip-iscor) is found only in early Latin; cf. Pers. 121 coepüre ; Truc. 232 coepiat.
ego: emphatic ; he is not the one to start them.
96I. saluos saluos: nom. sing. and acc. plur. respectively, in the usual order of such phrases ; cf. alius alium, absens absentem. 'Sound myself, I see others sound', i. e. do not regard them as mad. A mad or drunken man thinks all others mad or drunk, but himself sane or sober.
noui (ego) homines: a further proof of sanity ; cf. $A m p h .448$.
959. perperam, 'erroneously'; for this adverbial termination cf. quam, clam, palam, promiscam (Pseud. 1062), protinam (Mil. 1193). Adverbs in -am, like those in -sim, -tim, are usually called accusatives sing. fem., though possibly they are relics of the old A-stem instrumental sing. in -am.
ipsi : the asyndeton marks the contrast.
960. huc : he points to Erotium's house.
nimi' prouentum est nequiter, 'things have turned out shockingly'; this sense of the verb is colloquial or late ; cf. Pers. 456 rem .. prouenturam bene confudo miki ; Tac. Hist. iv. I8 si destinata prouenissent; more often witha living subject, as Rud. 837 edepol proueni nequiter multis modis; Truc. 385 .
961. ad noctem, 'by nightfall' ; cf. Poen. 844 ad postremum, ' by the time the end comes', i.e. ' in the end '.
962. Messenio returns from the quay-side inn, where he has bestowed the bagsage and sailor-porters. He thinks he has arrived in ample time to assist his master from the banquet as arranged (cf. 436-7, 701-3, 986-9). He enters the stage R., as coming from the harbour, and fails to perceive Men. I, who is at the opposite end of the stage; and we are to imagine that Men. does not see or hear Mess. till 1003. For the ensuing soliloquy, in which Messenio describes the qualities of the seruos frugi in a tone of self-righteousness, cf. Aul. 587 seq.; Most. 858 seq. On the metres of this canticum consult the Schema Metrorum. It opens with a simple system of bacchiacs; cf. 57 I seq.
spectamen, 'mark', or perhaps 'guarantee of worth '.
seruo: dative of advantage, exercising the function of a genitive ; cf. Rud. 935 monumentum meae famae et factis.

MENAECHMI

id, the subject, is explained by $u t$. . rectius, 968-9.
qui rem, &c. : the relative clause amplifies bono: 'It is the mark of a good slave, one such as manages, &c., his master's business, that he . . .'
967. conlocat, 'arranges'; cogitat, 'spends thought upon'.
968. rém |ěrí : hiatus at the end of the first hemistich.

970-1. tergum . . crura . . oportet potiora esse, 'he must have more regard for his back and his legs' (i.e. to save them from uerbera, compedes ; cf. 974).
971. potiora esse : sc. ei ; lit. 'be more important in his eyes'; an antecedent to quoi ... situmst must be supplied here in the dative (of the person judging), and in the next line as subject.
quoi . . . situmst: if situmst is equivalent to סóáкıtтat, the phrase means 'whose mind is discreet', lit. 'is in a discreet condition'; but possibly modeste means ' not too much one way or the other', and the expression is a colloquialism corresponding to our 'whose heart is in the right place'. Bergk suggests modéste modéstumst, which certainly has a Plautine ring.
972. id: explained by the clause quid. . . eris; cf. id, 966.
qui nihili sunt ( $=$ oi $\mu \eta \delta \delta \dot{\epsilon} \nu \partial{ }^{\circ} \nu \tau \epsilon s$ ) qualifies $e i s$ in the dependent clause.
quid . . . preti : explained by uerbera, &c., 974-5. For pretium in a bad sense cf. Hor. Od. iii. 24. 24 pretium est mori.
973. ignauis . . . uiris: in apposition to eis qui nihili sunt. The words are so awkwardly placed (after eris) that they have been bracketed as a gloss by Ritschl.
975. molae: refractory slaves were sometimes punished by being sent to work at a pistrinum (flour-mill), where corn was ground between mill-stones (molae) kept in motion by manual labour ; cf. Pers. 22; Most. 17 ; Ter. Phorm. 249-50. The rest of the line indicates the circumstances under which the work was done. The pistrina were generally situated on the owner's country estate, and a town-bred slave thought it the worst of all punishments to have to work really hard in a chained gang, and to live on short rations in a bleak country village ; cf. Asin.31-5; Most. 16-19; and see Ramsay's Mostellaria, Excursus xv.

If magna is omitted the line is a perfect bacchiac tetrameter.
977. id . . . malum : referring to 974-5; malum in its common Plautine sense of 'punishment'. This line, like the next two, is trochaic. Scan the second foot as a proceleusmatic. In the absence of the usual diaeresis there is caesura in the fifth foot, and a dactyl is allowed in the fourth : Introd. 6. II. E. c, p. 33.
certumst, 'it's my resolve'; cf. Aul. 676.
978. magi' . . . faciliu': sc. quan ueroera ; for the double conparative cf. 55 ; Aul. 422. Scan quám mălŭm|; nâm. The fifth foot is a proceleusmatic.
uerba: uerbera: cf. Ter. Heaut. 356 tibi erunt parata uerba, huic homini uerbera; Ovid, Her. x. 38 uerbera cum uerbis mixta fuere meis. Messenio can put up with a scolding.
979. nimio $=$ multo, but has stronger force. Scan lŭ|bêntiŭus $\mid$ mớlítum: sc. far; mō|lítum, 'strenuous effort', verbal noun from mollior, with punning reference to mŏlŭtuem: 'I much prefer eating what others grind to the dreadful grind-of grinding': the word-play balances that in 978. Mōl̄̄tus is not found elsewhere, but there are several other verbals in -tus (e.g. frustratus, perditus) that Plautus alone uses, and he only once. To take the line otherwise involves the scansion lŭub|êntu|l|ts mollŭ|titm quām|mơlưtūm, but such variation of stress (molitiom, mólitum) cannot here be justified (see 32I-2 note) ; moreover the repetition of mollŭtum would be both utterly pointless, and bad Latin. On prachibeo see 802 note.

980. seruo id: cf. Pseud. 698 seruas imperium probe.
982. alii sei .. . sint, ego... ero: the indicative of the apodosis expresses certainty, the subjunctive of the protasis leaves the question open. The MSS. read aliis $\bar{e} \bar{e}$ ( $=$ esse), from which Lindsay gets alii sei by change of one letter and redivision (see also App. Crit.). The second hand of B gives alii esse, which Niem.-Brix adopts, taking the first esse as subject to in rem esse. A literal translation of this reading would run: 'Let others be as they think it to be to their interest to be'. A 'monströses Wortspiel' on esse (edere) such as Brix ${ }^{5}$ suspects would here be feeble and un-Plautine. Scan ĕro tưt mĕ | èsse : the line is trochaic.
983. metum id ... adhibeam . . . apstineam: cf. 249; a conditional sentence without si expressed, apstineam being apodosis; ' If only I keep this before me as a matter for anxiety,' \&c.: id is explained by ero ut... sim praesto; for careless order cf. 966-9, 972-3. See also note on 984. Scan mĕtum ̌̆d mĭhi ăd- (proceleusmatic), and $l o ̆ c \check{c} s \operatorname{sit}_{\frac{1}{2} m}$ : the line is anapaestic.
culpam apstineam: for this acc. cf. Mil. I 309 si apstimuissem amorem ; contrast 768 above, apstinent saepe culpa.
$983^{\text {a }}$. metuont: i. e. behave cautiously, show a wholesome awe. This line and the next closely resemble Most. 858-6I both in sentiment and language. Scan cărěnt me̛tŭu|ōnt $\left.\frac{1}{z} \right\rvert\,$ sŏlĕnt ès $\mid$ se ěriss $\left.\frac{1}{u} t \right\rvert\,$ ibiles (anapaestic). For shortenings see Introd. 7. I. B. b, p. 43.
$983^{\mathrm{b}}$. nil metuont : metuont as in last line.
postquam ... metuont : here metuont has a stronger meaning, 'are frightened'. Various emendations of this line have been suggested; the general sense is obviously that reckless slaves, after they have done something to deserve a beating, then (when it is too late) do become afraid. Vahlen, incorporating a conjecture of Pylades, reads promeriti, tunc i metuont (see App. Crit.) ; for omission of auxiliary in a dependent clause, cf. 119 ut facturus dicam. Perhaps the best suggestion, as being closest to the MSS., is promeriti, tum qui metuont! 'how frightened they are then!' Scan mălŭm prô-.

984. metuam hau multum : the sense seems to require an emphatic egohere. Possibly therefore Hermann is right in rejecting $983^{\text {a-b }}$ as an interpolation from Most. 858-6I ; if those two lines are omitted, met. hau mult. will be apodosis to adhibeam in 983 (culp. apst. in that case also being protasis), with the meaning 'I shall have little cause for anxiety'.
quando tceruso faciamit: the initial $c$ of ceruso following -o of quando probably conceals hoc (agreeing with pretium), which gives good sense if taken as referring to metuam hau multum: 'this reward', namely, immunity from the cares and anxieties of slavery, i.e. manumission; cf. II48. With regard to the rest of the puzzle, Lindsay's suggestion (see App. Crit.) quáan|do höc ĕ́rüs quāē făcī|am (二pro eis quae faciam) entails a rather harsh ellipse. Bothe, on the ground that $-m$ is often added wrongly to a word in MSS. (cf. MSS. readings in Mil. 58, 154, 236-8), suggests öb fác|tă prétijum exss-; but this would give a tribrach (which cannot stand for an anapaest) in the sixth foot. Possibly oo faciam of the MSS. (or -o fatiam, as some read it) conceals the word optatum.
985. (eo) . . . exemplo ( $=$ strong ita), 'after this fashion', explained by tergo ut . . . arbitror.
tergo: dative of advantage, cf. Ter. Andr. 546; Merula reads tergi; for genitive or equivalent with in rem esse cf. Trin. 628 ; Pers. 342 ; Ter. Hec. 102.
986. uassa, 'our traps'; cf. Livy xxi. 47. 2 uasa colligere (of military baggage).
ut iusserat qualifies ita uenio aduorsum, for which phrase see 437 note. Mess. thinks that his master is still in Erotium's house.
988. tneque utrumt: Brix formerly read atque eum, after Gronovius ; Niem., with Bothe, prefers atque wirum (cf. his uiro for utro, 188 , quoted in note on 183); Ritschl, meumque erum. One is tempted to suggest reque uirum, or reque ut eum (colloquial repetition of ut, as in Capt. 248) : i. e. re ... sahuom (sc. si non animo), 'with purse (if not heart) intact' : cf. Truc. 46-50 (47 esp.). Mess. must have momentarily forgotten that he has the purse (cf. 386, 701) ; otherwise the metaphor in this line and the next is pointless.
saltu damni: i.e. Erotium's house ; cf. 133, and Trin. 314 damni conciliabutum, used in a similar connexion. Saltus is properly used of a mountain pass or forest ride, such as affords good ambush for brigands ; cf. the metaphor of the pirate-ship, 344, 442.

990. The Senex now returns, with four lorariz, who are to remove Men. I to the doctor's. Here he is giving them final directions. A lorarizs (from lōrum: classical Latin carnufex) was a strong slave employed to chastise others. The term is found in this sense in stage directions only; cf. Capt. ifo seq.
per ego uobis deos... dico: pronouns are thus frequently placed between per and its case in oaths and adjurations; cf. Ter. Andr. 834 per ego te deos oro.
991. sapienter, 'skilfully', 'without bungling'.
quae... impero: colloquial redundancy, defining imperium meum with exaggerated minuteness; cf. Epid. 526 si quid est homini miseriarum quod miserescat.
992. medicinam, 'surgery'.
sublimis: sublimen is found in some MSS. here and 995 , 1002, 1052; Mil. 1394. Ritschl accepts the form in all these passages as an adverb ('aloft' $=\mathrm{Gk}$. ${ }^{\circ} \rho \delta \eta \nu$ ), and reads it against the MSS., which have sublimem, in Asin. 868; Ter. Ad. 316; Andr. S61. Lindsay, who here and in 995, \&c., reads sublimen in the first impression of his Plautus (Script. Class. Bibl. Oxon.), now accepts here the reading sublimis, which is supported by Heraeus (Philol. 55, 198), and in 995, 1002, 1052 reads sublimem. In any case the meaning will be 'carried away on your shoulders'.
993. cătuĕ quisquam . . . fecerit: the sing. caue is perhaps due to the influence of quisquam, but sometimes the word is quasiinterjectional, e. g. Poen. 117 caue dirvumpatis; so age, Mil. 928 age . . . abite. caue in prohibitions is normally followed in Plautus by the tense in $-\operatorname{sim}$ (S-aorist optative), or, as here, the perf. subj.

MENAECHMI

Scan fêr|rĕ? égŏ, | ĕre: hiatus at change of speaker is normal; for hiatus after ĕgocf. 719; here it also precedes a vocative. See further, Introd. 7. IV. D. a. iii. It is possible also to scan égo, ër ĕĕ, with hiatus following the vocative. Schwabe suggests 〈audeo〉 audacissume, needlessly.
1004. The hiatus is legitimate, occurring as it does before a vocative and at the diaeresis of an iambic octonarius; see Introd. 7. IV. D. a. iii ; 6. II. C. c.

Epidamnii : for the form cf. 258 ; the form in -ensis is more frequent in this play, occurring in 32,57 , 1000 .

1004-5. erum ... deripier: acc. and infin. in apposition to facinus; or perhaps exclamatory, as in Amph.882-3.
1005. pacato: i. e. a town with which his own town of Syracuse was then on friendly terms )(hostili. Lambinus points out that pacato, luci, in uia, liber form a sort of climax emphasizing the indignitas of the facinus.
luci, ' in broad daylight'; cf. Amph. 165 ; Cas. 786 ; sometimes joined with a masc. or neut. adjective, as Aul. 748 luci claro; Cist. 525 cum primo luci. That luci in these phrases comes from an I-stem with nomin. lucis (masc.) or luce (neut.) is evident from Capt. 1008 lucis das tuendi copiam. Luci is not 'temporal locative', but simply ablative of time ; cf. Cist. 525 (quoted above) ; Merc. 255 mane cum luci semul; Ter. Ad. 841 cum primo luci ; so the abl. of lux is used in classical Latin, e.g. Verg. Aen. iv. 186 luce sedet custos. Similar ablatives of time are vesperi, heri, temperi (cf. Iozo, note).
1007. mittite, 'let him go', addressed to the lorarii ; cf. Iooo, ioiz, ioif.

The line is a trochaic octonarius acatalectic.

1oIo. numquam:cf. 683 numquam factum reperies, and see note on 533.

By this time Messenio has reached the struggling group; he now tackles three of the four lorarii (cf. 1052), leaving the fourth to Men.

IoII. istic =isti-ce: dative (of disadvantage); cf. hisce Iol2, huic 1014. MSS. here read isti; Onions, supposing haplography, suggests isti, te ab umero.
ab umero: lit. 'on the side of the shoulder'; the prep. is unnecessary.
1012. sementem ...faciam: as we say, 'plant blows'; the metaphor is continued in opseram. Sometimes the metaphor is, so to speak, reversed; the blows are a crop gathered from the sufferer's back, e.g. Aul. 45, where Staphyla is called stimulorum seges;

For this (modal) ablative cf. I 33 meo malo, I 34 nostrum salute socium; Amph. 366; so frequently with cum, Asin. 896 cum malo magno tuo; ibid. 909 ; Aul.425. The latter usage is classical in certain phrases, e. g. cum summo (maximo) alicuius periculo (detrimento, emolumento, &c.). There is hiatus at the diaeresis; scan máaumo ror4. oculi locus . . . appareat: i.e. that the socket appear where the eye once was; the injunction of IoII is repeated. Cf. 156.

IOI5. uós ... uós ... uós: we may suppose that with each utterance of this ictus-bearing word, Messenio inflicts damage on one of his three opponents, striking each in turn till they cry for mercy in a chorus.
periimus!' Murder !'
roi6. opsecro hercle! conventional mode of expressing a cry for mercy ; cf. Asin. 41 I ; Ter. Eun. 669.
ergo, ' well then ', i. e. if you want me to let you off.
quid me uobis tactiost? 'What business have you to lay hands on me? ' me is governed by the verbal noun (governing the same case as the allied verb), the logical subject being in the dative. In interrogative sentences of this type, introduced by quid, Plautus uses the verbal noun in -io precisely as the gerund of transitive verbs was used in O. Lat. (e.g. Trin. 869 mi... agitandumstuigilias; Lucr. i. III poenas in morte timendumst); cf. Amph. 519 quid tibi hanc curatio est rem . . . aut muttitio? A sinn. 920 quid tibi hunc receptio ad te est meum uirum? Aul. 423 quid tibi nos tactiost? Curc. 626; Truc. 622 quid tibi hanc aditio est? quid tibi hanc notio est? Terence uses verbal nouns in -io in similar sentences, but the verbal noun, instead of governing the same case as the allied verb, is followed by a genitive ; cf. Eun. 671 quid huc tibi reditiost? uestis quid mutatiost?
roi7. pecte: as we say, 'give them a dressing' (an appeal to Mess.). For the metaphor cf. Capt. 896 fusti pectito.
roi8. em tibi etiam!'there's one for you too'; Messenio has routed his three opponents, and now attacks the lorarius with whom Men. has been engaged. For this phrase accompanying a blow cf. Asin. 43 I em ergo hoc tibi; Curc. 195, &c.

MENAECHMI

1019. commetaui, if correct, means 'mapped out', 'explored thoroughly'; lit. 'measured', 'surveyed'. Other readings are commentaui'(inferior MSS., =' 'drawn patterns on'), and commutaui (Ital.; cf. Amph.316-17).
1020. suppetias . . . adueni: suppetias (cf. 1003) is accus. of motion; cf. 396 ire infitias, 328 eas ... malan crucem, where see note. The phrase suppetias ire (uenire, proficisci) often occurs in the Bellum Africanum.
temperi ... modo, 'just in the nick of time'; cf. 445, and see note on luci 1005 . For this ablative-ending see note on 479 parti.
1021. quisquis es: cf. 1007. Why does not Messenio take any notice of the words?
1022. apsque ted esset: apsque, as used by Plautus and Terence, appears only, as here, in the protasis of a conditional clause, joined to a personal or demonstrative pronoun, and followed by esset or foret; cf. Capt. 754 ; Trin. 832 ; Pers. 836. Scan nam äpsquĕ tĕd $\mid$ ésset (? Introd. 7. 1. B. b. ii, p. 43: a doubtful case). 1023. si . . . facias, 'if you did the right thing'.
emittas manu: cf. Aul. 817, and for methods of manumission see II48, note.
1024. liberem ego te? liberem either repeats the mood of emittas, and is potential, or, more probably, is deliberative. Men. speaks in astonishment; Messenio thinks his tone is indignant or contemptuous.
uerum, 'yes', lit. 'that's right'; cf. Asin. 790; Ter. Ad. 543 ; factum is used similarly, e.g. Trin. 429 ; Ter. Ad.561. For omission of est in these quasi-interjectional phrases see note on 338.
1025. quid, erro ? 'what (do you mean by saying) I am mistaken?' Cf. Mil. 818 LV . sorbet dormiens. PA. quid, sorbet?
1026. non taces? colloquial mode of answering one who seems to be talking nonsense or telling a lie; as we say 'Oh, shut up !'. Cf. Amph. 700 AM. numquam factum est. so. non taces? Here Mess. thinks Men. is joking.
meu' seruos, 'slave of mine'.

liber esto: the formula of manumission ; cf. II48, note.
1030. nemp' iubes? the verb is emphatic ; 'do you really order me (to be free)?' i. e. as master.
imperi . . . in te: cf. Hor. Od. iv. 4.2 cui rex deorum regnum in aues uagas permisit. Possibly te is abl. ; cf. Mil. 6II (MSS.). Messenio takes si quid . . . mini as strengthening iubeo.

103I. patrone: the manumitted slave was the cliens of his old master. Messenio adapts himself to the new conditions at once; cf. 1032, IO33 fui.

103I-2. 'quom tu liber es ... gaudeo': Messenio imagines himself returned home and receiving the congratulations of his fellow-slaves ; cf. the actual congratulations he receives, II48. For a similar imaginary scene cf. Merc. 946-50. quom, when used thus as equivalent to quod, 'whereas' (after gaudeo, &c., cf. I I48; Epid. 7 II ), is generally regarded as an old neuter sing. (acc.) of the relative.
1032. credo . . . uobis: Messenio's imaginary answer to the imaginary congratulations. Crecio was the conventional answer to such congratulations ; cf. Ter. Ad. 972, Andr. 939, 946-7.
1034. domum : i. e. to Syracuse, where his real master lived.
1035. minime : spoken aside. Men. had had enough of clientes.
1036. opsignatum : in the absence of locks and keys of the modern diversity of pattern, householders guarded against pilfering on the part of slaves by affixing seals to bags, chests, cupboards, and even wine-jars.
1038. reddibo: cf. Cas. 129 ; this form of the future seems to indicate an original distinction between $-d o=\delta i \delta \omega \mu i$ and $-d o=$ $\tau i \theta \eta \mu \iota$ : the original future of reddo in the sense 'give back' may have been réd-dăbo, which by natural weakening of the unstressed syllable would become réddŭbo. Mess. here exit, leaving Men. to meditate on the strange vagaries of fortune he has experienced.
1039. nimia mira, 'very strange occurrences'; cf. $A m p h .616$, 1105; Cas. 625 tanta mira.
$1041-2^{2}$. The true reading in these lines is very doubtful; the difficulty of restoring the original is increased by the fact that 11. 1037-43 appear in P twice, (a) between IO28 and IO29, and (b) in their present place, and that differences of reading occur between the lines as given in the first place and as given in the second: the readings of the two passages will be hereafter referred to as (a) and (b) respectively. It is reasonable to suppose that the passage had been omitted in some early copy owing to homoeoteleuton, marsuppium being the last word in both 1036 and 1043 (for the same reason 1044 appears in P after both 1036 and 1043), and that it was restored to the text，first in the wrong place，before 1029 （owing to another homoeoteleuton， 1044 quo uolet， 1029 quo uoles），and then in its original position．The most serious difference of reading between（a）and（b）occurs after excludunt foras（1040）， where（a）gives uel ille qui se petere modo argentum．modo qui seruom se meum $|\mid$ esse aiebat．quem ego modo emisi manu，while （b）gives etiam hic seruom esse se meum aiebat quem ego emisi manu： it will be noticed that the last nine words of（b）are almost identical with the last ten of（a）．From the traces that remain in the Ambrosian palimpsest，it is clear that that MS．gives 11．I037－43 in their right position only，but omits 1042 and $1042^{2}$ ．So much for the facts； three suggested elucidations may be given．（I）Lindsay suggests that the omission of $1042-42^{\text {a }}$ in A and（b）was due to homoeote－ leuton（emisi manu 1041 and $1042^{2}$ ），and that the variation of reading between（a）and（b）arose from the lines having originaliy been arranged as he gives them in the text．According to this arrange－ ment hic．．．quem ego emisi manu will be contrasted with alii 1040，and uel ille will mean＇even he＇．Objections are that the passage thus displays repetition to the point of incoherence；that hic 1041，ille 1042，is 1043，all refer to the same person；and that uel ille should naturally mean＇for instance，that fellow＇（cf． $873^{\text {a }}$ ）．

（2）As elsewhere the readings of（a）are inferior to those of（b），we may here adopt the reading of（b）with the slight change of esse se meum to se meum esse，and delete lines 1042－42 ${ }^{\text {a }}$ ，the reading of（a）， as being a clumsy interpolation made up from 1041 and 1043. This would give a triple contrast between alii 1040，hic ．．．quem ego emisi manu 104I，and socer et medicus 1046，ll．1043－5 being a parenthesis．（3）We may with Niem．prefer the reading of（a） here，and suppose that uel ille introduces a particular example of a general statement given in a missing line contrasting in sense with Io40．In the confusion of the double restoration，such a line as Niem．suggests，alii appellant me éum qui non sum，ét subueniunt， adiuuant，may well have dropped out after 1040 owing to similarity of beginning．Niem．further conjectures that etiam hic of（b）may be a corruption of words omitted before seruom in 1042 as it stands in（a），and proposes to insert etiam ignotus mihi after［modo］ argentum［modo］qui，deleting each modo（for a similar corruption in P cf．495）．If both suggestions are adopted，the passage 1040－3 will stand thus ：

1042 uél ưllĕ́｜qui se petere argentum，｜quĭ 〈ětī｜am ignotus mihi〉 $1042^{2 \pi}$ seruom se meum esse aiebat，quem ego modo emisi manu， 1043 is ait se，\＆c．

medicus, 1042-5 being parenthetical, and illustrating the generalization of IO4I by a particular case introduced by uel; cf. $873^{\text {a }}$.
1042. se petere argentum : sc. aiebat; 'said he was fetching (going to get)'
1044. quo uolet : original mood retained.
1045. quando . . . factus sit: the force of the perfect is ' when he has been completely restored to sanity'; or perhaps the tense simply represents the fut. perf. indic., which would here be normal. The subjunctive is used here either to mark indefinite time (quando $={ }^{*} \tau(a \nu)$, or to hint at the improbability of his recovery ; or may be due to 'mood-attraction', on which see Lindsay, Syntax of Pl., pp. 67-8. Scan sit, which rctains its original quantity ( $=$ siet ). As Messenio has offered to bring him some money for no apparent reason, Men. naturally concludes that he is mad, but proposes to profit by that madness. Neither of the Menaechmi has a high standard of honesty ; cf. Men. II's trickery, 524-49.
1047. nihilo esse ...sētius quam somnia: sc. sunt; the adverb in conjunction with esse as in the phrases bene fui, &c.; cf. Truc. 172 longe aliter est amicus atque amator; Ter. Phorm. 529-30.
1049. si possum, 'in the hope of'; for tense and mood see note on 418 . Men. thinks he had better at least pacify his wife.

Men. I now disappears into the house of Erotium; at the same moment Men. II enters R. with Messenio. Men. II had gone harbourwards with the intention of sailing a way at once (878); failing to find Messenio he had started back again, and had then met Messenio, who was on the way to fetch the money for his supposed master (1038), and whom he rates for giving him the slip.
1050. men ... te : object and subject respectively of conuenisse.
1051. aduorsum mi ... uenires : cf. 437, note.
quin modo, 'why, didn't I just now . . .?' Used thus, quin ( $=q u \hat{i}-n \bar{e}$, 'how not ?')' is equivalent to nonne introducing a rhetorical question that makes or corroborates an assertion; cf. 1058; Capt. 1017 quin, inquam, intus hic est.
1052. homines qui $=(a b)$ hominibus qui ; so where antecedent should be abl. alone, cf. 311 above; or dative, cf. Aul. 595 pueri $q u i=$ pueris $q u i ;$ Mil. 598. This attraction of the antecedent to the relative is normal in O. Lat. when the antecedent stands in the relative clause, as Mil. 155 hic illest lepidus quem dixi senem. It was in imitation of the less ordinary usage that Vergil wrote urbem quam statuo uestra est, Aen. i. 573.
1054. quŏ́m ĕgo āc|curro: the indicative is quite normal after quom, even in classical prose, when the quom-clause contains the more important statement (so-called 'inverted' construction); here the historic present is used for vividness ('when suddenly I rush up ').

MENAECHMI

ingratiis: a modal ablative used in the sense of ' against his (her, their, &c.) will', without qualifying word where no ambiguity can arise; cf. Amph. 371 ; Mil. 449 ; rarely qualified by a gen. or possessive adj., as Cas. 315 amborum ingratios; Merc. 479 tueis ingratieis.
1056. petere: cf. 1042. It is wrong to say that in these lines the pres. infin. is loosely used for the future ; petere means 'go to fetch', as uisere means 'go to see '.
quantum potest: cf. 850 ; the verb, when impersonal, does not suffer tense-change, as the clause, being equivalent to an adverb-phrase (summa celeritate), is treated as fixed and unchangeable. When the verb is personal it varies in tense ; cf. Aul. II9 quantum potero.
1057. praecucurristi obuiam: a pregnant expression, lit. 'you ran on ahead in my way'; what he means is 'you ran on ahead (by a secret route and then came back) to meet me'. Messenio imagines that his master has repented of the promise he supposes him to have made (IO29), and has played him this trick in order to repudiate it.
quae fecisti: i. e. in giving him his freedom.
infitias eas: cf. 396, and for the accusative (of motion) cf. 1020, 328. Livy often uses the phrase infitias ire, followed by acc. and infin. or a quin-clause; the construction here may be acc. and infin. (supply te ea fecisse), or (ea) quae fecisti may be the direct object, infitias eas being = infitieris; cf. Most. 100 gnaruris uos uolo esse hanc rem. The force of the present eas after a historic verb is 'in order to deny (as you intend to deny)'.
1059. mepte: the emphasizing suffix -pte is elsewhere found attached to possessive pronouns, as Capt. 37 I tuople ingenio ; Most. 156 meopte ingenio, & c.
1060. Men. I now comes out of Erotium's house, shouting back to Erotium and her slaves; cf. rio seq. This line and the next two are iambic octonarii. Scan hērcle êa.

Io6I. facietis ut . . . apstulerim : lit. ' will you bring it about that I have taken', i.e. ' will you establish it (as a fact) that I have taken'. Hiatus after unstressed ego, cf. 903 ; but see App. Crit. 1062. Messenio now catches sight of Men. I.
speculum tuom: cf. Amph: 442, where Sosia is puzzled by the resemblance of the false Sosia (Mercury) to himself, and says quem ad modum ego sum (saepe in speculum inspexi), nimi' similest mei. Shakespeare has an echo of this line in Com. of Err. v. I. 4 17: ' Methinks you are my glass, and not my brother.'
1063. consimilest $=$ consimilis est (for consimili' est) ; cf. Amph. 537 qualest $=$ qualis est. For the phrase cf. Amph. 443 tam consimilest atque ego. (Possibly these phrases should be printed consimilist, qualist $=$ consimilis't, qualis' $t$; see Introd. 7. I. D. c. i.) quam potest : probably impersonal.

COMMENTARY: LINES $1054-76$

1064. noscito, 'take stock of'. Cf. Amph. 441 quom illum contemplo et formam cognosco meam.
1065. Men. I now catches sight of Messenio, and hastens to address him, having designs on the marsuppium.
1066. Menaechmo: cf. 43. The use of the appositional dative in this and similar phrases is common in O. Lat.
1067. domus et patria: Bücheler's correction eadem urbs is unnecessary, as domus and patria refer to Syracusae and Sicilia respectively. Havet suggests domus et patri $\langle a$ e $\rangle$ a est mihi: he thinks that the bracketed letters have been omitted by haplography, and $e a$ restored in the wrong place. This certainly improves the rhythm.

IO7o. hoc... est: Men. II, thinking the other a trickster (cf. 1077-8), answers churlishly.
noui equidem hunc, 'well, at any rate I know this one'; here Mess., who has himself got confused between them, points to Men. I. His error continues throughout his speech; he sets himself right in 1076 ; cf. 1084-5. Similarly in the Com. of Err. the Duke addresses the wrong Antipholus, v. I. 362: Duke. Antipholus, thou cam'st from Corinth first? Ant. S. No, sir, not I; I came from Syracuse. Duke. Stay, stand apart; I know not which is wbich.
1071. egoquidem evidently emphasizes the first person more than equidem 1070.
huiius . . . huiius: pointing to Men. I and Men. II respectively.
1072. égo hŭnc cēn|sebam: this line is addressed to Men. I.
hunc . . . huic : referring to Men. II.
exhibui negotium : i.e. by asking him for his freedom; Gk. тра́үиата тарєі́Хоу.
1073. This apology is addressed to Men. II.
stulte... atque inprudens: for union of adv. and adj. used adverbially cf. Capt. 960. We should say, 'if I said anything foolish unawares'.

1074-5. Men. II clears up the confusion by a pertinent question.
1076. The sentences in this line are addressed alternately to Men. II and Men. I. Mess. now distinguishes them correctly. A speaker similarly addresses two interlocutors alternately in Rud. 1089.
tu seruom quaere: to Men. I, 'you must look for (another) slave'. For this use of quaerere cf. Livy iii. 45. I I sciat ... condicionem ('a new match') filiae quaerendam esse.
tu salueto: tu uale, 'greeting to thee' (to Men. II) ; 'farewell to thee' (to Men. I). This seems better than to take both these sentences as addressed to Men. I in the sense 'farewell and prosper', or 'farewell for ever' (the formula uttered over the dead).

MENAECHMI

Edd. who adopt the latter view quote Capt. 744 ; Verg. Aen. xi. 97-8. Havet, who takes these words in the way preferred above, states that as a general rule salueto is used by characters in Plautus only in reply to a greeting; the opening greeting is always salue. He gives as illustrations Asin. 296-7; Curc. 234-5; Merc. 283-4 (reading of A) ; Rud. 416. He adds that it is used here either as a more ceremonious formula, or that it has full future imperative force, and $=$ 'to you (Men. II) I shall presently say salue'; i.e. when he formally greets his old master as patronus on receiving his freedom; cf. IO31 ; Most. 746. The former and simpler of these explanations is to be preferred. Rud. 103 is against Havet's view.
1077. hunc: pointing to Men. II.
quae baec fabulast? 'What's all this business?' A slang use of fabula (cf. Germ. Geschichte), as in Most. 937 ; Pers. 788 ; Ter. And. 747: pl. fabulae $=$ foolish tales, nonsense; cf. 724 above.
1078. Why did not Men. II express incredulity in 1068-9? Probably because he thought that Men. I was either joking or attempting a confidence trick (cf. 1087). Again, why does not Men. II at once perceive that Men. I is the brother whom he is seeking? The answer is that dramatic requirements make it necessary that the àvavóptots should be slow and gradual ; that it is so slow, however, is one of the improbabilities of the plot.

Moscho: cf. 407.
1081. Messenio's words down to seuocabo erum are spoken aside.
spem . . . quam suspico, 'that consummation of which I have a presentiment' (explained in next line) : for spes $=$ 'fulfilment of hope' cf. Merc. 843 spem speratam quom optulisti; and for this use of suspico(r) cf. Rud. 1091, Ter. Heaut. 614.
suspico: but cf. Rud. Iog1 suspicor. So in Plautus we find opino, Ludifico, mereo, vago, as well as the deponent forms.

commemorant pariter, ' mention in identical terms'.
quae: either neuter, as referring to nouns of different gender, or feminine, agreeing in gender with the last noun.
1084. quid uis? naturally both answer in a duet to the call Menaechme.
1085. uter : relative; cf. 187 ; 'but (I want the one) of you two that...' Cf. Com. of Err. v. 1. 369: Adr. 'Which of you two did dine with me to-day?'
uostrorum: a colloquial form of the partitive gen.; cf. Aul. 321 ; Stich. 141.

COMMENTARY: LINES ro76-1ior

hiatus, not after hominem (see App. Crit.), but after uidi; the last three words are spoken slowly and impressively ; see Introd. 7. IV. D. d, p. 56.
hominis: sc. alterius. It is probable that similis was invariably followed by a genitive in Plautus; in the few places where MSS. give dative, they should be altered (as here, where the source of error is obvious). See Lindsay's Captizu, note on 582 .
similiorenn numquanı uidi : sc. quam hic tui est similis; or, better, read comma at end of line.
1089. aqua aquae: cf. Mil. 551-2, and Fr. comme deux gouttes d'eau.
nec lacte est lactis, $\& \mathrm{c}$. : the same expression $A m p h .60 \mathrm{I}$; Mil. 240; the English equivalent is 'as like as two peas'. For the archaic nom. lacte cf. passages just cited, and Bacch. II34.

Iogo. autcm, 'moreover'.
poste: introducing another argument; Gk. ${ }_{\epsilon}^{\prime \prime} \pi \in i \tau a$. On the form cf. 838 , note.
1091. meliust: classical prose melius erit with perf. infin. Cf. 329.
hunc ( $=$ Men. I) is the object of both infinitives. Hiatus at the diaeresis. Havet suggests munc (me) percontarier; this would improve the rhythm, and give point to perge . . .esse, IO93-4; and it is Messenio alone that conducts the investigation.
1092. hercle quî: cf. note on 428.
1093. si inuenis: for colloquial substitution of pres. for fut. in the protasis of a conditional sentence referring to the future cf. Mil. I213 diutitias dabo, si impetras; Capt. 331, and the phrase si sapis. See also 847, note.

Io94. spero: sc. me inuenturum (as then he would get his freedom).
1095. quid ais tu? addressed to Mcn. I.

1096-8. Messenio addresses Men. I: huic . . . hic . . . huic refer to Men. II.
1098. dixti: huic, hiatus at a pause between antithetical clauses, or scan dizxti: hül信. Possibly dixisti should be read ; but for dixti closely following dixisti cf. Merc. 658.

IO99. operam ... mihi dare: in a double sense, 'give me your attention ', and 'do me a service' (i.e. by procuring me my freedom). With zoobis, operam dare has latter sense only.
I Ioo. quod uelis: object of impetres; cf. Mil. 1200 quod uolui ... impetrauti; Capt. 232-3.

IIoI. tam quasi $=$ tamquam si, quasi being a shortened form of quam si. Cf. Curc. 5 I tam ...quasi soror mea sit with Asin. 427 tamquam si claudu' sim.
emerís: cf. 921 perciopit.
seruibo: for this form cf. Merc. 546, and see note on scibo, 386 above.

MENAECHMI

1105. possum : spoken with a lordly air.
agite uterque ... dicite: cf. notes on 674, 779, III9.
ino6. quod sciam : not here limitative, but relative with subjunctive of generalization.

IIO-22. This long-drawn interrogatory is tedious to read, but would be made amusing on the stage by the airs assumed by Messenio in his rôle of detective, and by the evident enjoyment with which he conducts the cross-examination; cf. III4, II2 I.
inio. conueniunt, 'tally'; cf. II3I; Ter. Phor. 53 conueniet numerus quantum debui.

III2. ut abii, 'when I went away'; this temporal clause is resumed by a redundant postec. It is better to take it thus than to suppose a double construction after the unexpressed memini, namely ut abii . . . me deerrare, 'how I went . . . (and) that I strayed'. For the facts cf. 24-33.
abii Tarentum: the best MS. available (B) here reads habitarem tum; other MSS. abii tarentum variously divided; while for auehi in III3 $\mathrm{B}^{1}$ and $\mathrm{B}^{2}$ read abiit and abii respectively. Havet, ingeniously arguing from the order in which the circumstances would have impressed themselves on a child's memory, proposes cum patre ut naui Tarentum, supposing that nazi was corrupted successively into nabi, habi (B), and abii (PCD). He further suggests that the $a b i=(t)$ of $B$ at the end of III 3 represents an abii displaced from III2, which he replaces thus: cime patre ut naui Tarentum a $\langle$ bii á $\rangle$ mercatum, póstea. (Cf. 26-7, clearly derived from this line.)

III3. Scan mê dêērrāre, or mé deerrārĕ with hiatus at diaeresis.
III4. serua me! 'protect me', i. e. grant that I be not disappointed. A phrase used when an unhoped-for joy seems to be on the verge of fulfilment; cf. Capt. 976; Curc. 640. Cf. the complementary phrase used when there is no longer any doubt, 1120.
quid... taces? to Men. II. Messenio will have no interruption; he wishes to complete his detective triumph; cf. II21.

III5. Messenio further questions Men. I. patria has first syllable short in Plautus, and is therefore followed by hiatus here, perhaps owing to the influence of the lost ablative-ending - $d$; but see App. Crit. Cf. II5I.

III6. septuennis: cf. 24.
cadebant primulum, 'were just beginning to be shed'. Domestic detail of this sort is often introduced to evoke laughter from a modern music-hall audience. It was scarcely necessary for Lambinus to quote three Latin authors in proof of this physiological fact ; for literary references to it cf. Aristoph. Ran. 418; Juv. xiv. Io cum septimus annus Transierit puerum, nondum omni dente renato.

III8. ut . . . maxume memini, 'to the best of my recollection'.
III9. uter eratis... maior? (sc. natu) = uter uostronum erat (as Io85) ; colloquial, cf. 779, 785, IIO5.

II20. di ... uolunt: his hope is realized; see III4, note.
II2I. si ... tacebo: Messenio's great detective act is not yet completed.
dic mihi : Messenio turns to Men. I again.
II22. uno nomine: for this abl. (of description) cf. Capt. 590 neque. . . ullus seruos istoc nominest.

II23. Hiatus at a pause between two contrasted sentences; cf. 1098, and see Introd. 7. IV. D. c. ii, p. 56.

Sosiclem: cf. Arg. 4. Note that this is the first mention of this fact in the play itself.

II24. contineri ... queo: same expression Rud. II72. contineri has middle force.
 pause preliminary to Men. II's surprising disclosure, or to his embracing Men. I at this point. See Introd. 7. IV. D. d.

II27. Niem. fills the gap thus: te 〈dĕerrasse a patve |et surruptuin ab homine ignóto $\rangle$ ét patrem, \&c.; cf. 37-9, III3. Hildyard does not mark a lacuna (no trace of one appearing in the MSS.), but reads renuntiatum est de te, et patrem mortuom.

nomen . . . fecit mihi : i. e. indidit; cf. Livy viii. 15. 8.
 mi $h \bar{o} c$.

II3I. Teuximarchae : this is Merula's correction of MSS. teuxinarce, for which Stowasser reads Teuxinarchae, taking the name as $=\theta \varepsilon o \xi \in \nu a ́ p \chi \eta$.
conuenit: cf. IIIO.
1132. From this line to the end the Ambrosian palimpsest (A) is again available, but in a partly legible state only; see 594, note.
annis multis post: see App. Crit. The order given by $A$ may be justified on the ground that the hiatus after the vocative insperate marks either a dramatic pause or a fraternal embrace; cf. I125. The expression ('many years afterwards') is elliptical, the sense being obviously 'so many years since I last set eyes on you'. For this combination of adverbial post with ablative of measure cf. Verg. Aen. vi. 409 longo post tempore; similarly post is combined with abl. of time, $A m p h .481$ decumo post mense; Hor. Sat. i. 6. 6I nono post mense.

II35. hoc erat quod . . . uocabat: according to the usual explanation quod wocabat is subject, and hoc complement, of erat; lit. 'the fact that she called you ... is after all (i.e. means) this'; more freely 'so that's the explanation of her calling you ...' The expression hoc est (erat) quod . . . is a formula used when a speaker has hit upon the explanation of something hitherto mysterious; cf. Merc. 71 I ; Asin. 864 ; Cas. 531 hoc erat ecastor quod me uir. . . orabat mezus, ut properarem; Verg. Aen. ii. 664 hoc erat, alma parens, quod me . . eripis? Cf. also illuc (istuc) est quod (Rud. $125 \mathrm{~S}, \& \mathrm{Cc}$.). It is possible in all these cases to take the relative as adverbial ( $=$ propter quod; see note on 677 quiid est quod ) and the demonstrative as subject; or, still taking the relative-clause as subject, to regard the demonstrative as adverbial.

hūulus uocabat nomine: it is best to take this in the sense 'called you by his name', i. e. 'called you Menaechmus', huizus referring to Men. I, to whom the name really belonged. Messenio is addressing Men. II, who is properly Sosicles. If the words are taken as meaning 'invited you on his account', i. e. ' in mistake for him', the sentence will be illogical, the explanation being mixed up with the fact to be explained. Again, in 1136, where wocat does mean 'invites', its sense is defined by the words ad prandium.
quom uocat: historic pres. with quom was a colloquial usage; cf. 1115 quom . . . auehit ; Amph. 668 quom abeo; Hor. Sat. ii. 3.6 I and 277.

II 37. namque, ' (yes,) for ...'
hic: he points to Erotium's house: so huic II39, huc II 40.
1138. clam as a preposition is followed by acc. in Plautus; cf. I 52 .

1138-9. quoi pallam surrupui . . . eam dedi: loose asyndetal arrangement of clauses; or perhaps paratactic (eam for quam). See App. Crit. quoiam, suggested by Redslob, would necessitate scanning rüxórem, and would here be relative, though quoius -a -um is usually interrogative in Plautus ; cf. however Rud. 745. Ritschl reads quoi quam pallam . . . eam dedi, which would be too stiff for conversation; Brix puts a colon after domo 1138 .
1139. hanc: he holds out the palla.

II42. Cf. 476 , from which the missing word is supplied.
aturum hoc: he now displays the spinter.
1144-5. memet esse : supply te as subject. See App. Crit.; Müller proposes me esse, 〈credo〉, credidit. Havet's suggestion med adesse (corrupted into med esse) is perhaps the best ; Erotium had been expecting Men. I back from a walk (cf. 213-15), and when Men. II appeared, thought that Men. I had arrived.

II46. numquid me morare quin . . . siem? 'I suppose you put no obstacles in the way of my receiving my freedom?' Cf. Aul. 612 ne adfinem morer quin... meam... filian ducat. Or perhaps, if moror negatived $+q u i n$ is here used as Livy (e.g. iii. 54. 4) uses moror negitived + quominus, 'I suppose you have no objection to ...?' me being anticipatory. In any case the words are addressed to Men. II ; cf. the next line.
ut iusti ( $=$ iussisti) ; referring to 1093 liber esto, &c.

COMMENTARY: LINES 1135-55

II47. fac : sc. ut liber sit.

II4S. liber esto : cf. I029, I093. Manumission of a slave at Rome was effected by one of two methods: by a formal ceremony in the praetor's court, which consisted of the owner's striking the slave with a uindicta (liberating rod), turning him round, and then dismissing him with the words liber esto (cf. Pers. Sat. v. 75 una Quiritem uertigo facit; ibid. 78 uerterit hunc dominus, momento turbinis exit Narcus Dama); or, as here, by an informal pronouncement of the formula liber esto in the presence of a witness; cf. Ter. Ad. 970.
quom tu es, &c.: Men. I jokingly congratulates Messenio in the very terms in which the latter had, in his presence, imagined his fellow-slaves to be addressing him, IO3I-2. At the same time, congratulations to a newly emancipated slave were usually expressed in this formula ; cf. its ironical use, Epid. 7II. On this use of quom ( $=q u o d$ ) see IO3I-2, note.

II49-50. meliorest . . . auspicio: he means either (I) that as he has already been deluded by an informal manumission (I029), he would this time like one 'under better auspices', i.e. carried out formally before the praetor, which it would be impossible to revoke; or (2) that the gift of freedom without a more material gift would not carry with it certainty of freedom for ever (e.g. he might fall into debt, and become the bond-slave of his creditor) ; he wishes for some 'still better luck' to enable him to keep up his new dignity: this wish he obtains, II55. For similar requests cf. Epid. 727 nouo liberto opus est quod pappet; Ter. Ad. 980-2. Probably Messenio speaks this line aside, as the next lines contain no reference to it; when a suitable opportunity occurs he prefers a definite request openly, II 54-5.

II5I. nóstra éx: the hiatus may perhaps be due to the disappearance of the abl.-ending $-d$; but see App. Crit. Brix suggests éx nostrá, which gives a bad rhythm.

quidquid est: sc. mihi.
II54. eamus intro: into which house? See 963-4. frater : see App. Crit. here and II 52. The repetition of frate? is natural under the circumstances; it occurs six times between II 33 and this line.
scitin : to draw attention.
II 55. praeconium, 'the job of auctioneer'. Praecones were of two kinds: public praecones, appointed publicly to conduct auctions of state property, booty, &c. ; and private (professional) praccones, who combined the callings of crier (equivalent to modern billsticker: cf. 46) and auctioneer : the latter gave public notice of auctions (cf. 1156 conclamari) as well as conducting them. Cf. Cicero's metaphorical use of the term, ad Att. xiii. 12.2 Ligarianam (his speech pro Ligario) praeclare uendidisti (advertised) : posthac quidquid scripsero, tibi praeconium deferam.

nunciam qualifies conclamari, but if Bergk's reading is accepted (see App. Crit.) it qualifies fore. The word $=$ nunci-am; see on 962 .
1156. fore quidem dǐeséptumi, 'yes, as taking place this day week'. For dieseptumi cf. Pers. 260 ; die as 'temporal locative' has in agreement with it an adj. in the locative case; cf. I 157 mane ...septumi ; Most. 881 die crastini, and the ending of the first component in postridie, quotidie. See also 1005, note.
1157. Menaechmi: sc. bonorum. Messenio here invites the audience to the auction ; cf. $880-\mathrm{I}$.
sane, 'without fail'. Alliteration and jingle are part of the auctioneer's stock-in-trade.

fundi : country estate with house attached; aedes: town house; cf. Dig. 1. 16. 211. To avoid hiatus Havet reads praedia, aedes, supposing fundi to be an error for $\bar{p} d i$ or $\bar{p} u i d i$, i. e. praeuidia (cf. praeuides $=$ praedes), final $-a$ having dropped before aedes. (The assonance would certainly be suitable here; cf. note on sane, I1 57.) See, however, Introd. 7. IV. D. d, p. 56.
II 59. quiquilicebunt, ' at whatever price they will fetch' (lit. be bid for) ; quiqui probably represents the locative of quisquis, and $=q$ uanticumque ; see 549, note.
praesenti pecunia : as in modern auctions. For the phrase cf. Cic. ad Att. ii. 4 praesentem pecuniam solui imper aut.
1160. uenibit: retention of original long quantity here is due to pause before comic тарà $\pi \rho о \sigma \delta о к i a v . ~$ quoque etiam : colloquial redundance. Brix denies, however, that the phrase is ever tautological in Plautus, and says that here quoque $=$ 'besides' (the other goods), and etiam = 'actually', 'even'. See also note on 1161 quinquagesies.
emptor: participial, =empturus; cf. 274 pransoribus.
II6I. uix credo, \&c.: spoken in a depreciatory tone : 'I scarcely think the whole sale will bring him in as much as-five million.' The joke lies in the тарà троб $\delta$ окia.
capiet: sc. Menaechmus I.
quinquagesies: (for the usual quinquagies, probably a vulgarism introduced metri gratia; cf. Joe Gargery's architectooralooral $)=$ quinquagies centenar milia sestertium, nearly $£ 45,000$, reckoning the sestertius at $2 \frac{1}{\mathrm{~s}} d$. When sums of money are mentioned, a numeral adverb with sestertition denotes so many hundred thousand sesterces, a distributive numeral with sestertia so many thousand sesterces. Leo suggests quinquagesimas (sc.partes), i. e.

COMMENTARY: LINES Ir55-62

two per cent. of the real value of the goods. Havet accepts this conjecture, and, on the ground that Messenio had not met the Matrona, while Men. II had experienced her tongue and temper, alters and redistributes ll. II60-I thus:

MEN. II. Venibit $\langle n e\rangle$ uxor quoque? MEN. I. Etiam si quis emptor uenerit, uix, credo, tota auctionc capiet quinquagesimas :
the last speech meaning, '(Yes, but) even if any purchaser turns up, I hardly think that she will fetch two per cent. of the proceeds as she stands (totă)'. Havet does not, however, adequately prove that auctione $=$ auctionis by his reference to Capt. 569 ; and both his suggestion and Leo's weaken the comica uis of the passage. The text used by Warner scems to have assigned etiam ... uenerit to Men. I, as he translates 1160 thus: Mess. .. .'Will ye sell your wife too Sir ?' Men. Cit. 'Yes, but I think no bodie will bid money for her.'

II62. plaudite : cf. Hor. A.P. I55 donec cantor' uos plaudite' dicat. The plays of Plautus and Terence regularly end with a request for applause, made either by the last speaker in the play, as for instance here and in Amph., Mil., Most., Rud.; or by the grex or caterua (the whole troupe of actors), as in Capt., Trin., &c.; or by the cantor (actor employed to sing the cantica), as in 'Terence's plays. Shakespeare imitates this usage, e.g. in the Epilogue to All's Well, 'Your gentle hands lend us', and in the closing words of $M$. . N. D., 'Give me your hands, if we be friends '.

Appendix on LL. 590-5

592-3. Of the many suggested emendations of this verse perhaps the best is Ritschl's dixi, eam (better, dixei, eam) controuorsiam $u t \|$ sponsio finiret (Vahlen differret: i. e. put off the final decision). This gives the same sense as the present text. Brix ${ }^{3}$ adopts these changes, and further alters aut plus aut minus to haud. . . haud m. (or haut... haut m.). Teuffel supports the latter change, and interprets the passage as meaning, either: Men. being in a hurry said no more than was necessary, but at the same time no less; or, preferably: Men. did not fall into the error of saying (claiming) too much or too little. To illustrate the latter rendering he refers to Cic. de Orat. i. 36. I66-8, where a story is told of an advocate's endangering his case by claiming too much through ignorance of the law; cf. Most. 63I-2 DA. ninilo plus peto. TR. uelim quidem hercle ut uno nummo plus petas (i.e. for then you would lose your case). These parallels are hardly appropriate ; for (i) if the cliens was making a claim at all, his claim was evidently a fraudulent one : Cicero's point was that the advocate had a just claim, but claimed slightly more than was due; and (ii) since Men. knew his cliens to be in the wrong (594), it must surely have been his aim to get more or less than the truth inserted in the terms of the sponsio. On the other hand Teuffel's first rendering lacks point, though it does not conflict with his interpretation of praedem dedit (see below, iii).

A few other suggestions may be noted. Ritschl, followed by Brix ${ }^{1,2}$ reads plus minus ( $=$ circiter) ; but in the passage given as a parallel, Capt. 995, the phrase used is plus minusque, which there means 'both more and less'. Sicker, followed by Niemeyer, reads dixeram in controuorsiam (haplography). Onions shows that comparatively few and trifing changes are needed to rearrange 11. 592 to 597 (meis) as a continuous passage of trochaic septenarii.

593-4. quid ill' qui praedem dedit? nec magis, \&c. There can be no objection to taking nec here in its ordinary adversative meaning of and yet $\ldots$ not, the general sense of the passage being: ' I took the utmost pains to get the case settled by a sponsio-and what d'ye think of my cliens, who was fool enough to insist on a regular hearing? And yet (in that case he was bound to be defeated, for) never have I seen a man who was more obviously in the wrong: there were three strong witnesses against him (whose evidence might, however, have been evaded by means of a tricky sponsio).' Teuffel raises the curious objection that, if praedem dedit is taken here in its usual sense of 'gave security for the mesne profits', i.e. 'let the case proceed to a regular hearing in iudicio' (see Notes, 590 ), nec will be meaningless. Apparently he imagines that nee must mean nor indeed (i.e. must be corroborative, and cannot be adversative). He takes praedem dedit in the sense of 'gave security for the penalty' (i.e. as though already convicted), and interprets the passage as follows: 'What of my cliens, who caved in ?--and indeed I never saw a man more obviously in the wrong : (more rascal he for wasting my time).'

This interpretation is open to grave objections, namely :
(i) Men.'s general complaint about having his time wasted is contained in 11. 585-9: in 11. 590-5 he gives vent to the particular complaint that in this case he wasted not only his time but his labour and ingenuity. He would in any case (even if his cliens had won) have wasted his time ; his labour would not have been wasted if his cliens had acted sensibly.
(ii) According to this interpretation Men., with absurd inconsistency, first complains that his cliens caved in, and then immediately uses words which imply that he was right in doing so.
(iii) If the cliens gave surety for a penalty (i. e. a fine), the point at issue must have been some offence committed by him ; therefore this interpretation conflicts with Teuffel's second interpretation of haut plus haut minus as given above.
(iv) A surety for a penalty was vas not praes.

Teuffel's alternative proposal, to take praedem dedit in the sense here preferred, and to shift 1l. 594-5 so as to follow 1. 589, is quite unnecessary if nec is taken in its adversative sense.

    ${ }^{2}$ Original Latin plays representing Italian provincial life (fabulae togatae) had little vogue.

[^1]:    ${ }^{2}$ Epp. ii. I. 1 万o seq. ; A. P. 2ヶ0-4.

[^3]:    1 The Queen employed regular companies of juvenile amateur actors, composed of boys from Windsor (i. e. Eton), Westminster, St. Paul's, and the Chapel Royal choir-school, who performed plays based on classical models on days of festival. For a professional comment on this unfair competition see Hamlet II. ii. 318-47 (ed. Verity; see also his Appendix on Elizabethan Stage-history, pp. 229-33).

[^4]:    1 The introduction of two pairs of characters resembling each othermasters and slaves respectively-is evidently a reminiscence of the Amphitruo, to which Shakespeare is also partially indebted for that scene of the Comedy (III. i) in which Antipholus of Ephesus is locked out of his own house while his brother dines within.

    2 The subject of mistaken identity was also utilized by Shakespeare in Twelfth Night.
    ${ }^{3}$ Probably William Warner, an Oxford man and an Attorney of Common Pleas. He wrote Albion's England (1586). It must be added that many Shakespearian scholars doubt shakespeare's having had access to this translation.

[^6]:    1 W. W.'s version is printed in full as an Appendix to Henry Cuningham's edition of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors in the Arden Shakespeare (Methuen). It has also been edited by Rouse (I9I2) in the Shakespeare Classics Series.
    ${ }^{2}$ See Introd. 7, pp. 34-5. See Introd. 7, pp. 35-40.

    ${ }^{2}$ Hence nominally a tribrach alone can be substituted for a trochee in the last foot of a trochaic octonarius : see below, II. E. b. ii.
    ${ }^{3}$ Accordingly in this edition, wherever the scansion of a line is symbolized (as frequently in this section and the next of the Introduction, and in the Notes), ictus is marked in each foot for the sake of clearness.

[^8]:    ${ }^{1}$ How the spondee could be regarded as the metrical equivalent of the iambus has been explained above, I. (c).
    ${ }^{2}$ See above, I. (a).

[^9]:    ${ }^{1}$ See also note ad loc. ; and on word-groups consult Introd. 7, pp. 38-40.
    ${ }^{2}$ A caesura is a break, occurring within a foot, between two words.
    ${ }^{3}$ Penthemimeral $=$ occurring after the fifth half-foot; hepthemimeral $=$ occurring after the seventh half-foot.
    4 A caesura might simultaneously occur in any other foot or feet.
    b A diaeresis is a break, occurring at the end of a foot, between two words.

[^10]:    ${ }^{1}$ i. e. as forming two separate half-lines. So in English such a line as is quoted in (h) below may be (and generally is) printed as two.
    ${ }_{2}$ The apparent spondees occurring before diaeresis in the fourth feet of lines 995 and 999 are probably to be scanned as iambics by disregarding final -s before an initial consonant. See Introd. 7. I. D. b.

[^11]:    ${ }^{3}$ Attempts have been made to prove that the Saturnian metre was quantitative ; but the mass of authority, from Bartsch and Westphal down to Lindsay, is in favour of regarding it as accentual. According to the generally accepted view the Saturnian verse consisted of two hemistichs, the first containing three, the second two, stressed syllables, ictus coinciding with stress. The commonest forms were of the type > dáhent málum Metélli \| Naéuio poétae

    or, frima incédil Céreris \|I Prosérpina puier.
    2 By quantity is meant the time taken in pronouncing a syllable. Roughly speaking, a long syllable should take twice as long to pronounce as a short one.

[^12]:    1 The accents printed in our modern Greek texts denote such tonevariations only.
    ${ }^{2}$ The term 'accent', in respect of Latin and other I.-F. languages (except Greek), denotes stress.
    ${ }^{3}$ Ennius himself, however, retains features of the older prosody in his iambic verse.
    ${ }^{4}$ Strict quantitative prosody is alien to other I.-E. languages, e.g. our own; see for instances Tennyson's Attempts at Classic Metres in Quantity.
    $s$ Virgil and Horace show traces of the earlier prosody, especially in their more colloquial poems, i.e. the Eclogues and the Satires and Epistles respectively. Similar traces appear in Catullus, Propertius, and Ovid.

    ${ }^{2}$ Ritschl himself failed to see that the frequency of hiatus in Plautus reflected a peculiarity of ordinary speech. One school of his followers strove to eliminate hiatus from the text of Plautus by indiscriminate emendation. Editors devoid of Bentley's knowledge, taste, or acumen strove to out-Bentley Bentley. W. Wagner is the worst offender.
    4 See his edition of the Captiui (Somenschein).

    ${ }^{2}$ Or, to put it differently, ictus usually falls on accented syllables.
    ${ }^{3}$ Words of more than three syllables have also a secondary inferior accent, as Mercuirius, flagitium, onerdriae, tempestatibus (cf. in Eng. mùltitúdinous).

    - Certain other apparent exceptions occur in words which have lost

[^15]:    ${ }^{1}$ See IV. A, B, D (a), F, below.
    ${ }^{3}$ See IV. E, below. ${ }^{4}$ See IV. C, D, below.

[^17]:    ${ }^{1}$ Synizesis occurs not infrequently in the works of the Augustan poets.
    ${ }^{2}$ In the present text eius, quoius, huius, quoi are so printed when they suffer synizesis; otherwise they are printed eiius, quoiius, huiius, quoii.

    ${ }^{2}$ Except in a few cases such as $\mu \eta \eta^{\prime}$ ov, \&c., which fall under the head of synizesis.

[^19]:    ${ }^{1}$ This phrase, here and subsequently, must be taken to mean: final syllables ending in a vowel, a diphthong, or $-m$ preceded by a vowel, when they occur before an initial vowel-sound.

[^20]:    ${ }^{2}$ Incidence of ictus is immaterial.
    2 Hiatus after such interjections may also be regarded as a special case of A. (a).

[^21]:    ${ }^{1}$ Such hiatus is not infrequently allowed by Augustan poets, even where the break occurs merely between separate clanses of a sentence; e.g. Verg. Ecl ii. 53, viii. 4I, x. 13 ; Georg. i. 4; Aen. iii. 606.
    ${ }^{2}$ This disputed hiatus is attested by a consensus of $A$ and $P$.
    ${ }^{3}$ See also E
    4 At the caesura.
    ${ }^{5}$ At the diaeresis.

[^22]:    1 That part of B which contains the last twelve plays was evidently copied from an original superior to that from which $B$ derived the first eight; according to Lindsay, it may even have been copied directly from the archetype.

[^23]:    1 With regard to the relation between $A$ and $P$, Leo holds that they are both derived from a recension of the date of Hadrian; Lindsay, that A is derived from an origisal, $\mathbf{P}$ from an acting version.
